Actor arrested for drug smuggling

LONDON — American actor Anthony Perkins went on location Monday in Yorkshire for shooting of the television movie "The Glory Boys," after being charged with smuggling marijuana and LSD into the country.

Perkins, 51, was arrested Sunday at Heathrow Airport when he returned from Los Angeles, where he had gone during a break in filming the $2.8 million movie for Independent Television.

He was released without bail and ordered to appear in court Thursday to face charges of smuggling eight grams of marijuana and three small doses of LSD.

Funicello to record country album

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Annette Funicello, ex-Mouseketeer, teen queen and peanut butter promoter, has added another dimension to her 29-year show business career — her first country music album.

The 41-year-old mother of three says she got the idea for the record after the success of her recent single, "The Promised Land," which she wrote as a tribute to her parents.

She said on a visit last week to Hot Licks Studio that she opted for Nashville musicians because of the friendly atmosphere of the city's recording industry.

"It's more of a family kind of thing, which I'm used to because of my Walt Disney background," Funicello said.

Kirkpatrick wins Truman award

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, the first woman to serve as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, has been named the first woman to be given the Harry S. Truman Good Neighbor Award.

The Good Neighbor Foundation called Kirkpatrick "a public servant in the best Truman tradition."

The foundation said in a news release issued Saturday that "her plain speaking has added a new note in world diplomacy."

The award was established in honor of Truman, who was born 100 years ago in Lamar, Mo., and served as the nation's 33rd president. It will be presented on May 8 in Kansas City at a luncheon observing Truman's birthday.

Official criticizes mayor's memoirs

NEW YORK — Mayor Edward Koch's memoirs have stirred plenty of criticism, but none stronger than that of Rep. Charles Rangel, who calls the book a "novel" written by a "psychotic."

Koch wrote that Rangel, a Manhattan Democrat, began to "visibly sweat" on one occasion when the mayor told him, "You have seared my soul with your rhetoric."

Asked if that were true, Rangel replied Sunday, "No. And the mayor either has a terrible memory, or he's a terrible liar."

Koch's book is due to be released Wednesday, but portions were obtained early by newspapers. Advance selections include unflattering descriptions of a number of prominent figures in the state.

"Anyone else who would say and do what Ed Koch says and does, people would refer them to a psychiatrist," Rangel said on WNBC-TV. "But when Ed Koch behaves the way he does, they say that's part of his personality."

Lack of parking space plagues Fairchild area

Since March 1983, a committee appointed by the Manhattan City Commission has been working on solutions to the parking problems near Fairchild Avenue.

The committee, which has representatives from all area greek houses and several residential homes, has found that there are several problems affecting parking in this area which is bounded by Anderson Avenue on the north, Denison Avenue on the east, the intersection of Sunset Lane and Delaware Avenue on the south and Wickham Road on the west.

In December 1983, 150 questionnaires were sent to residents of both greek and private houses in the Fairchild area. The committee is currently compiling the results of the survey in hopes of solving the parking problem.

The questionnaire asked the home owner, tenant or greek house resident how many off-street parking spaces are available at the address and how many cars are associated with the residence.

"The purpose of the questionnaire is to get a feel for the geography of the problem area," Larry Hulse, chief planner, said. "By requiring their block number or address on the questionnaire, the committee can pinpoint the problem areas."

Teresa Korst, junior in business administration and member of the committee, said, "After working on the problem for three months, the idea to send out questionnaires arose over a controversy of whether there was a real problem of violating city ordinances."

There are ordinances stating that automobiles parked along public streets must be moved every 48 hours; they cannot be parked on public streets in front of or three feet on either side of an existing public or private driveway entrance; and they cannot be parked on public streets within 15 feet of a fire hydrant.

"If people were more conscientious about (obeying) the city ordinances, there would be fewer problems," Korst said.

"Ideally, the perfect solution would be to acquire a lot that could accommodate the overflow of cars in the Fairchild area, but this is not possible right now," she said.

A permit solution has also been suggested. A certain number of permits would be issued to each greek house or resident, making it unlawful for any car without a permit to park in the area. This solution would leave spaces for visitors, which is a concern of residents.

"Finding the equitable solution is tough because someone always ends up losing," Hulse said.

Speech must be seen in context

Senator Edward Kennedy's Landon Lecture must be viewed in the following limited context: it was a speech by a politician, about another politician.

Even within this context however, there were important points brought out. One was the documentable disparity between some of Reagan's campaign declarations and his record. Another was the fact that he is attempting to run again on the same declarations.

One selling point in 1980 was that Reagan promised to balance the budget. The problem, he said, was social spending. Social spending has consequently been cut greatly the last three years. Yet as Kennedy pointed out, "the deficit is now $50 billion larger than all discretionary domestic spending combined."

Another campaign selling point was that Reagan would make us all feel safer by building a larger defense. We are still building our "defense" at an ever greater rate, but does anybody feel safer? I realize that feeling safe is very subjective; some people feel safe with the threat of nuclear war hanging about. Most would feel much more confident if we were even attempting to negotiate with the Soviets on the matter.

A third point that Reagan used was that he would reduce "big government." In actuality big government has simply slipped into a military uniform — and grown. The imbalance between the government's revenues and its expenses is now $150 billion per year larger than when he went into office. It cannot be blamed this time on wasteful social spending, but solely on expanded military programs.

It was admittedly a political speech. Kennedy criticized Reagan for saying what people wanted to hear. But Kennedy himself said things that some people present wanted to hear. He talked about hunger, poverty and peace, but more of his statements hinged less on facts than on nice phrases. However, his comments on the nature of Reagan's incumbent candidacy were valid.

With an incumbent presidential candidate, we should look not to his promises but to his current policies and the intentions they reflect. Does his present budget show a sincere effort to cut the deficit? Does the present polarization with the Soviet Union reflect the intention of seeking a sustainable, safe peace?

As Kennedy said, "We have to remind ourselves that he is in office, not in opposition. It is his government, and he must not be permitted to run for reelection by running against himself."

Students deserve lecture access

Sen. Edward Kennedy delivered his Landon Lecture yesterday to a packed McCain Auditorium. It is disappointing that an additional 700-1,000 people, some of whom had waited more than an hour in line, were turned away from the speech.

The first logical solution to the problem encountered with such popular speakers would be to have the lecture in Ahearn Field House. That Kennedy refused to deliver his speech in Ahearn, for security reasons, necessarily complicated the seating problem.

Given McCain's limited seating capacity, one can turn to the question of who should be permitted to attend such lectures. Current policy holds that the lectures are open to the public on a first come, first serve basis because the series is supported entirely by Landon Patrons, who are members of the general public.

This policy is commendable in that it does not restrict any segment of society from attending the lectures. However, when any group takes an unfair advantage of the opportunity to hear such lectures, a problem is created.

Such was the case when buses loaded with hundreds of high school students appeared for the Kennedy speech.

That the lecture was a great educational experience for the students cannot be contested. However, the educational experience and views on national perspectives may perhaps be even more important to the University community who will actually go to the voting booths to help determine the nation's leadership.

The case against mass high school attendance is given more credibility when one considers that at least a dozen students from one medium-sized high school were admitted after the doors were shut under the claim that they were all "press" writing for their school newspaper.

The students were finally asked to leave when word came that their seats were needed for real press reporters coming from the airport with Kennedy. But the students should never have been admitted in the first place.

According to the book "Kansas State University," edited by James Carey, the lecture series was intended to better develop the University's function as a marketplace of ideas. To help develop that role, it makes sense to let those within the University community have every chance to attend the lectures.

The seating problem for the Kennedy speech was a no-win situation in that hundreds of people were going to be turned away regardless of any policy. However, some future policy changes could help ensure that the University community is at least not at a disadvantage when vying for seats.

K-State officials should not prohibit high school students across the board from attending popular Landon Lectures. One possible change, however, may be to work with the city so that parking for out-of-city school buses is not permitted during such lectures.

This policy would keep access open to the lectures for those high school students and faculty who wanted to drive cars to Manhattan. However, it would avoid the problem of losing hundreds of seats to blocks of students from a multitude of high schools across the state.

Biology course needs improvement

The Principles of Biology class on this campus is most unusual. It is a required class for almost anyone in a science-related field, yet there seems to be little effort to teach what students must know.

The first two class periods of each week — A.T. (audio tutorial) labs — students are instructed by a voice on a tape recorder. However, they don't know what "A.T." stands for when they first report to class. I couldn't recognize anyone as being in charge and felt confused. But the people who had arrived before me seemed to know what they were doing and were busy.

Since they seemed to be listening to tapes in booths, I located an empty booth and looked for instructions. All I found was a typed sheet attached to the wall explaining how to use the tape recorder. After the tape started, I felt relieved that I seemed to have found the place to begin, but frustrated that 10 minutes of my class period had been wasted.

Even after realizing that the tape explained procedures, I found it difficult to understand because of static on old tapes. If students don't understand what is being said on the tape or cannot accomplish the task the voice has set, there are graduate students available for help. But with so many students asking questions, it isn't easy to get assistance.

Many of the questions could be avoided if an orientation were provided. For example, the tape may direct us to the southeast corner of the room or to the demonstration on mitosis. But no one has pointed out where the southeast corner is or explained just which displays are related to mitosis. So graduate students have to answer unnecessary questions.

SHEILA EPPARD

Another problem is that even when students ask relevant questions, the answer may contradict another teaching assistant or the recitation instructor. For example, after looking at my slide, a graduate student verified that I was seeing a ghost cell. Later, an instructor told me that I couldn't really see ghost cells under a light microscope. He said, "Students just expect to see them, so they think that's what they're seeing." How are students supposed to respond to a situation like this?

In addition to the four hours a week in A.T. lab, there's a scheduled, one-hour recitation class. I found myself looking forward to this class, hoping it would clarify the material. While waiting for the first class, I overheard the instructor of the recitation class previous to mine state that 17 percent of the students drop the class during the first weeks, and 30-some percent fail the class by the end of the semester. These statistics shocked me! When my class began, I was disappointed to find there would be no lecture; my instructor explained that department policy required that the class be used for students to give a 15-minute talk based on a paper they write. In addition, approximately 15 minutes are used to hand back and discuss work sheets done in the A.T. lab. It became crystal clear there would be little help from recitation class.

There are, however, additional classes from which students can really benefit — classes the student can attend on his own time. During help sessions, a graduate student is available to answer specific questions on the week's material.

In addition, Holton Hall funds supplemental and review sessions where that week's module is covered. Unfortunately, these classes are optional; not part of students' scheduled time. If students have another class at that time, they are out of luck.

That students aren't being taught what they need to know in Principles of Biology seems evident. Since biology is a pre-requisite for most science-related fields, the department should make some substantial changes. Why are there no lecture classes on the modules during scheduled class time? Lectures would make the assistance time more relevant. Also, an orientation to the A.T. lab would make students feel more comfortable from the beginning.

I am very concerned that I'm getting neither my money's worth nor the knowledge I'll need for future science courses in Principles of Biology. And I know that many other students share my concern.

Editor's note: Sheila Eppard is a freshman in pre-nursing.

Letters

Ahearn should have been site for lecture

Editor,

I'm sure those students and non-students enjoyed watching Sen. Edward Kennedy on Monday. Unfortunately, I was one of the majority of students who stood outside with hopes of seeing a current and outspoken politician.

The capacity of McCain Auditorium is 1,815. There were easily 500 people standing outside, and who knows how many others were turned away by this sight. Many students who had 9:30 a.m. classes put this lecture out of their minds completely, knowing there were two chances of seeing Kennedy — slim and none.

Ahearn Field House holds 11,220, and perhaps there would have been some empty seats, but no fee-paying and tax-paying people would have been turned away.

I heard from a roommate who saw his high school English teacher in line that she drove a busload of students from Ellsworth High School more than 120 miles, only to be turned away for lack of seats.

I don't know who decides where the speaker will speak or who qualifies for Ahearn Field House. United States presidents only? There has to be a solution, perhaps a pre-lecture poll to get an idea of how many people are planning to attend.

I only hope there will be a solution to the seating problem sometime in the near future, so that perhaps a few more students can take advantage of the opportunity to hear speakers.

Handling of movie deters serious viewers

Editor,

We would like to make several points about the Union Program Council's Feature Films showing of "Last Tango in Paris" last Friday evening.

We feel that a disservice was done to a great number of people in the way the film showing was handled. First of all, it was not advertised adequately. None of the advertising mentioned that it is a serious French film, subtitled in English with some nudity and sex, but probably not deserving of an X rating by today's standards. If it would have been advertised properly, serious movie patrons like ourselves would not have been run out of the theater by drunk and obnoxious viewers expecting some mindless, pure sex film.

About 15 minutes into the showing, we and many others complained about the rude behavior of other viewers — nothing was done about it. Only one student UPC Feature Films committee member was left in the theater to monitor the film showing. Several viewers notified the K-State Police, but the rude behavior had not been checked by

One hundred and fifteen viewers had left the theater by approximately 12:45 a.m. UPC lost its serious viewers of the film, but it certainly didn't lose our money. We would like our money back, but since UPC does not tear tickets, we have no ticket stubs to prove we were actually there. However, we would like to encourage all others who were disturbed by the way this situation was handled to go to the UPC office in the Union and register their complaint.

We would like to suggest that next time UPC shows "Last Tango in Paris," it treat it more seriously. As viewers interested in seeing a good movie with a serious plot, we would like to be able to see it during the day or in the early evening, not at midnight after the bars have closed.

Landon Lecture attendance necessitates larger facility

Editor,

I'm just writing this letter while wondering how the Landon Lecture is going over in McCain Auditorium. I am one of the unfortunate many turned down at the door an hour before the Landon Lecture was to begin.

It seems to me if we are going to put out the big bucks to get prominent speakers to come to K-State, then any student who wishes to be there should be accommodated. I don't know who was responsible for putting Sen. Ted Kennedy in little McCain Auditorium. I just hope it wasn't the same people who put the "Stray Cats" in big Ahearn Field House. At this rate, if the Pope comes to K-State, he will be speaking in the men's room.

Campaign promises fall short

Analysis

What people say and what they mean often are different. Similarly, what they say and what later happens sometimes doesn't match.

Take, for example, proponents of the downtown redevelopment project. Thousands of pages of material can be collected on this topic, some of which contain conflicts in what those in favor of the project told Manhattan residents would happen and what actually occurred.

In the March 1981 issue of "Poyntz of Interest," a newsletter published by the city's Community Development Department, one of these conflicts is noted:

"It is very important to note that none of the financing for capital improvements in the downtown will require an increase in the property taxes or be a general obligation against the properties of Manhattan.

"In the event that it is necessary to finance any improvements in the downtown area, or any improvements related to the downtown redevelopment, through property taxes, state statutes require that a general obligation bond referendum be held and that voters have an opportunity to approve the bond issue."

Community Development Director Gary Stith, responding to questions from Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood at the Jan. 17 commission meeting, said "Poyntz of Interest" was wrong. About two mills wrong, in fact.

In the central business district redevelopment plan, approved as amended at the same meeting, the conflict between years past and the present becomes evident:

"Through the use of federal funds, tax increment financing, special benefit districts (most of which include only the mall site), revenue bonds and other non-local public resources, the city can redevelop the central business district with a maximum general obligation of $1,474,750 for the city's share of benefit district improvements not financed by water utility revenues.

"This would amount to a maximum additional property tax levy of 2.3 mills or about a 7.8 percent increase in city property taxes," the plan stated.

A factor which could have had some bearing on the newsletter's "wrong" statement was the general election April 7, 1981, in which Mayor Wanda Fateley and Commissioner Dave Fiser won seats on the commission. Lindamood also was a winner, running on an anti-redevelopment platform.

The only commissioner seeking a referendum is Lindamood.

"I wasn't responsible for what was published in 'Poyntz of Interest,'" Fateley said. "I don't know what bearing that had on the election. I would like to think people voted for me because they supported my positions."

In a candidates' forum published in the March 8, 1981, edition of The Manhattan Mercury, another conflict — this time having to do with mall financing — is apparent in Fateley's statement:

"The issue of downtown redevelopment will be addressed by the next commission. I believe downtown redevelopment as proposed is important because: it makes economic sense (at least $6 of private investment for every $1 of public investments)."

In the same redevelopment plan, public costs are listed at slightly more than $25 million. Private investments are shown at $27.4 million — hardly a six-to-one ratio.

Fateley said the figures used in her statement were "what UDAG projects were running at that time."

The plan states that funding for redevelopment will come from six sources: tax increment financing, $4,282,000; Urban Development Action Grant, $10 million; benefit districts, $5,034,000; revenue bonds, $2,620,000; state passthrough highway funds (for the southern arterial), $3 million; and National Endowment for the Arts, $100,000.

Even with the seemingly endless bombardment of redevelopment-related statements, some residents still don't know exactly what the project includes.

Excluding a commercial building to the south, the redevelopment project is bounded by Leavenworth, Fourth, Humboldt, Sixth, Houston and Pierre Streets, as well as U.S. Highway 24 on the east.

The project is to include a 325,000-square foot shopping mall, rehabilitation of commercial buildings, 50,000 square feet of new commercial space in the 300 block of South Colorado Street and an office building on the south side of the 500 block of Poyntz Avenue.

One of the more vocal proponents of downtown redevelopment is T. Russell Reitz, who was defeated for re-election to the commission in 1983 after serving several years. Reitz, who in 1981 was chairman of Concerned Citizens for Manhattan, an election-year political action group, has spoken out for redevelopment through political advertisements.

In one such advertisement published in the Mercury during the 1981 commission race, Reitz promised that redevelopment would create 1,200 new jobs.

"Information contained herein is certified correct," the ad stated, just above Reitz's signature.

If Reitz meant to include construction workers in his estimate, he would have been about 100 short of the number of new jobs to be created. If he meant permanent jobs, the prediction was way off. Only 789 permanent jobs would be created, according to the redevelopment plan.

So what did Reitz mean to say?

"Maybe the definition was a little bit fuzzy," Reitz said. "We thought (the figure) was going to be part of the project once it got rolling."

Reitz said Concerned Citizens for Manhattan was a group that met weekly at the Wareham Hotel to organize opposition to candidates against downtown redevelopment.

The group obtained some of its information from Forest City Enterprises, the mall developer, Reitz said.

In another ad in the April 5, 1981, Mercury, Reitz, again with his signature below, but not "certified correct," asked the question, "Can the city spend our local tax dollars to pay for the mall?"

"No!" the ad answered. "Kansas law provides that no general obligation bond can be used to pay for any project such as the downtown mall without a citizen vote."

A referendum would be "not really possible if they tried it," Reitz said. He said he worries about the "twilight zone" wording of such a question.

"My point is that when we were working on this, we used the best figures available," Reitz said.

In an April 5, 1983, Collegian ad, Citizens for Manhattan, another election-year group, declared that 1,100 new jobs would be created by the mall.

Another who favors redevelopment is Fiser. He, too, made statements regarding possible project-related tax increases during the 1981 campaign.

In the same edition of the Mercury as one of Reitz's signed ads, Fiser, in a question-and-answer column, declared his position on redevelopment:

"I believe in the downtown redevelopment concept, but support the position that local property taxes should not be increased for this purpose without giving citizens the opportunity to vote."

Fiser continued that the project doesn't call for the use of general obligation bonds, which it still doesn't. But it does call for a tax increase.

In an April 6, 1981, Collegian ad, Fiser gave the same statement.

In a Collegian story March on 27, 1981, Fiser repeated his opposition to raised taxes:

"Local property taxes should not be approved without giving citizens the right to vote."

Fiser said he now would have to consult city staff to determine what tax increase had been discussed.

"At the position we are now, I wouldn't be looking to a public referendum," Fiser said.

Mann, who seemed to avoid a nuts-and-bolts attack of redevelopment opponents in his 1983 commission advertising, declared his opposition to tax increases in a March 20, 1983, Mercury ad:

"I don't want to raise our taxes."

"At one point we were discussing whether we should go with general obligation bonds or tax increment financing," Mann said. "General obligation bonds would raise taxes in the city, so I was against general obligation bond financing."

Mann said that if there is a tax increase as a result of redevelopment, it would come from the city's paying its share of benefit districts.

"That has to do with very standard procedure which the city has been involved in before," Mann said.

In a sense, downtown redevelopment has been one long campaign. There were the races for city commission and the races for project financing. But redevelopment, in one form or another, is clearly here to stay.

Whether the campaign promises were truth or not is the decision of future voters.

City seeks more help for lawyer

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

With a predicted increased caseload arising from downtown redevelopment, some city officials say changes must be made within City Attorney Bill Frost's office to handle the cases.

"They're going to need more legal service for the mall," City Manager Don Harmon said. "How that will develop I don't know."

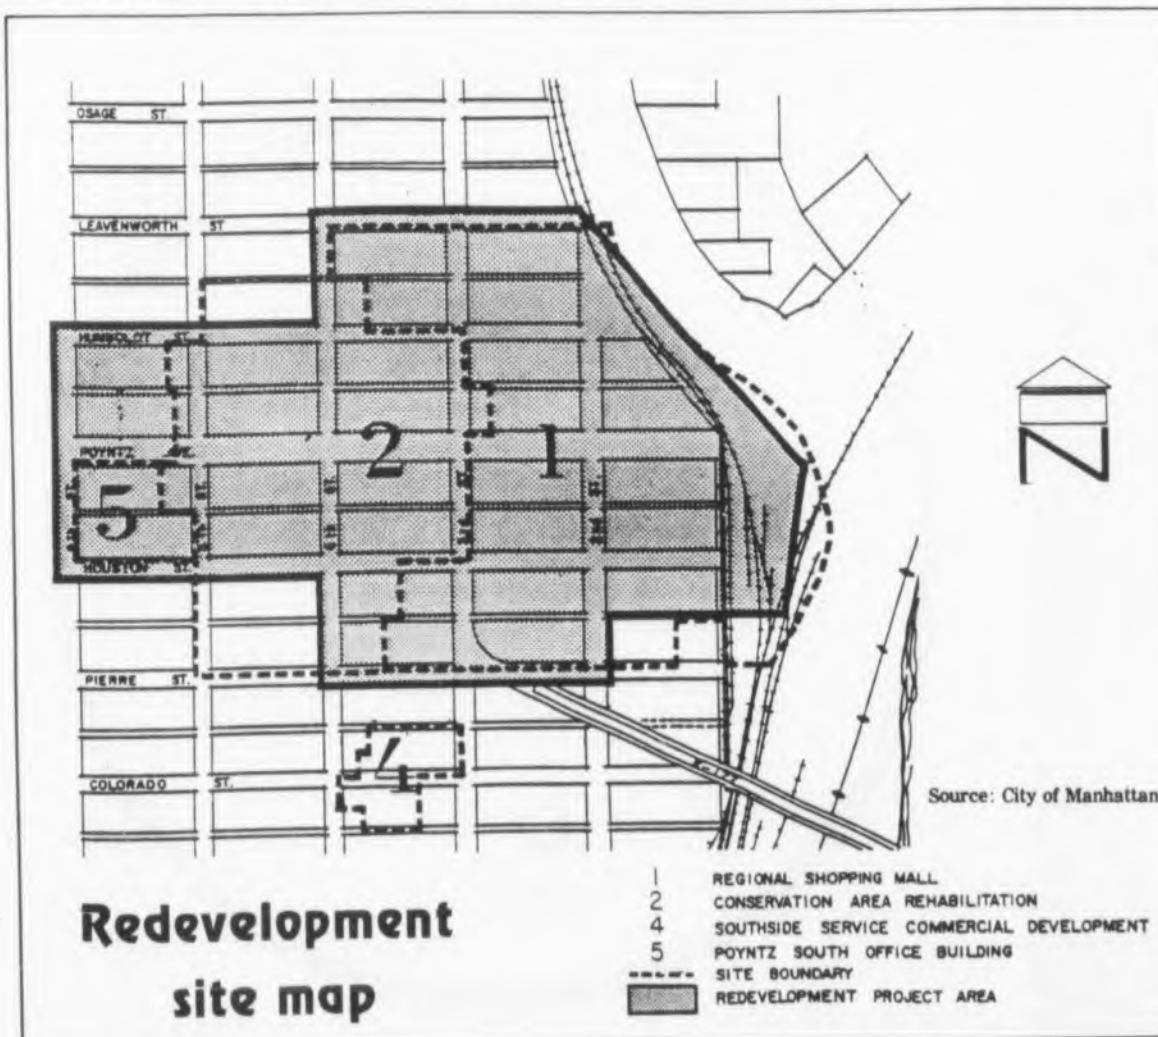

Frost said Harmon placed a memo in commission information packets at the Jan. 17 meeting stating that some changes might have to be made. Legal services required for the impending cases, such as service contracts and eminent domain, will be well beyond what the city attorney can handle under his current job status, the memo stated.

"They need more legal assistance," Frost said. "Whether it's more people or what, it's something that's going to require more than two-thirds of myself."

Frost, a part-time city employee, earns an annual salary of $29,910.40. Hutchinson's full-time counselor makes $31,164, while Salina's part-time attorney is paid $26,784. Both these cities have local governments similar to Manhattan's.

Both Frost and Harmon said they couldn't make an estimate on the number of cases because any estimate would be speculation.

"There's 80 some odd properties," Frost said. "They (cases) could range anywhere from zero to 80."

WTSU bowls over opponents in Midstates

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

West Texas State University, a newcomer to the Midstates Bowling Tournament, held Jan. 27-29 at the Union, added much-wanted competition to the Postal League and carried away the men's and women's traveling trophies.

More than 2,600 games were rolled in the Union's recreation area as 12 schools from four different conferences competed in the annual tournament. The Midstates tournament ended the schools' Postal League play of the fall semester. Gorden Vadakin, coach for Wichita State University and secretary of the Postal League, said.

"It's a long-running tournament.

It's been around in one form or another since 1960," Vadakin said. Conference scores and sanctioned tournament play created postal scores that each coach sent through the mail to the postal league secretary.

The secretary determined wins and losses and sent out a standing sheet. The postal league was designed to build excitement for the face-to-face tournament, he said.

The bowlers don't compete against each other for the first time until the spring semester, said Terri Eddy, recreation manager of the Union and one of the coaches for the K-State bowling team. This tournament is actually the ending of the Postal League for the year.

This year the Postal League added two schools to its membership, including tournament winner West Texas State University.

According to Bill Parsons, coach of the West Texas State University team, Vadakin had encouraged WTSU for four years to join the league.

"I think that he (Vadakin) wanted more competition, and I felt it would be good for our kids too, because of the competition that Wichita (State University) gives us," Parsons said.

Favored to win the tournament this year were the men's team from Wichita State and the women's team from West Texas State University. WSU men's team is currently ranked first in the nation, and WTSU women's team was the 1983 national collegiate champion.

The top 20 college teams are ranked by the Bowling Writers Association of America. The ranking, based on how the teams are bowling currently in conference and tournament play, is issued four times a year. K-State has never been ranked.

In the Midstates tournament, each team bowled two games against every other school, scoring 100 points for each game won. Scratch pinfall plus bonus determines the team winner.

Awards were given for high two-game series, high game, all-stars (the top five men's and women's total pins) and team sportsmanship.

Eligibility has become an important factor in the last two or three years. In the past, about the only requirement for participation was to be a full-time student. Now, minimum standard requirements state bowlers must carry an overall grade point average of 2.0 and be currently enrolled in at least 10 hours. Another requirement which took effect this year is that students must have completed at least 10 hours the previous semester, Eddy said.

"K-State has had a 2.0 GPA requirement on their bowlers for the last six years, but it was our option to do that," Eddy said. As a result of this requirement, K-State lost three men this semester because of eligibility.

The reason for the new ruling is that in some schools, students would enroll in classes and have their eligibility form signed (which said they were enrolled), then drop all their classes before the second semester. They would re-enroll second semester but were actually not progressing toward a degree at any time. They were simply going to school to bowl, Eddy said.

Ineligibility forced the University of Kansas and St. Louis Community College at Florissant Valley to drop their women's teams from the tournament.

The 15 bowling regions in the country will hold a tournament in February called the Association of College Unions International (ACUI) regional games tournament. The individual winners out of ACUI advance to a national tournament for individuals, and the teams compete at a sectional.

K-State's only chance to go to sectionals is to win the ACUI regional.

"Sectionals is the stepping stone to the team nationals. It's kind of like your NCAA national play-offs. You go to a certain area of the country to compete, and the winner out of that area goes on to nationals. If we were to go to sectionals, our team would go to Denver," Eddy said.

Parsons said WTSU has one of the best bowling programs in the nation. "I think it's one of the best. In the last four years especially, WTSU has really come out strong in the bowling program."

"I have kids from New York, California, Michigan, Texas, Montana, Delaware — you name it. I get kids coming in from clear across the country. And it's because of the program — we're always rated, and the kids want to come in and be with a good team," he said.

Christi Hooper, senior in computer science, follows through in good form during the Midstates Bowling Tournament at the Union bowling alley. West Texas State University won the men's and the women's classes in the tournament.

Coach's presentation covers pressure on women athletes

By BRAD NADING
Collegian Reporter

Dealing with pressures placed on the female athlete and utilizing objectives in coaching were stressed by Lady 'Cats Head Coach Lynn Hickey during the presentation "Coaching the Woman Athlete" Friday.

The most difficult problem facing women athletes is the sociological-cultural demands placed on them — having to project a positive image so they can be viewed both as athletes and females, Hickey said.

Another problem facing women athletes is the opportunity to continue competition after a collegiate career. Male athletes have the chance to advance into the professions while women do not, Hickey said.

"College athletics is a financial game," she said. "At times, they have to play for the love of the game with no financial awards after graduation."

And while the competition, actual workouts and desire to play are similar for both women and men, the ways women and men handle athletic stress is different, Hickey said. Men tend to physically take out their stress on their opponent, while women generally "mouth off," she said.

Another problem arises when the high school athlete enters the college scene.

"Many come in without much responsibility," Hickey said. "When they get here, they have to do it all. If they can't handle it, they're labeled a failure."

Society expectations also play a part, said Hickey, who added that parents often expect sons to go to college and succeed, but do not expect the same from their daughters.

And to help combat the loneliness that may accompany this departure from home, K-State athletes are given foster parents in the Manhattan community.

"The foster parents are just people the player can drop by to see, and they provide someone standing outside the locker room after a game to say 'good game,'" Hickey said.

But it is the coaches' responsibility, Hickey said, to convince the player that what she's doing is right, to teach her to have self-confidence and to set goals for herself, and to teach her teamwork.

The program that Hickey provides for her women athletes has been established to help them receive their academic degrees; to emphasize winning, but not at all costs; to push for a national championship and to develop young women athletes as people.

K-State even applies tougher academic regulations than necessary for its student athletes, requiring each player to maintain a 2.0 grade point average. The National Collegiate Athletic Association only requires a 1.8 average, Hickey said.

Another area where men's and women's athletics differ is in the level of attendance at their respective events. Hickey said she would like to see larger attendance at the women's contests, but knows that this form of entertainment and competition is relatively new compared to men's athletics.

Hickey has been the head coach of the Lady 'Cats since 1979. She captured all-American and all-conference honors while playing on academic scholarship at Ouachita (pronounced Washitah) Baptist University.

She was an all-state athlete while attending high school in Welch, Okla.

Cassandra Jones puts pressure on the University of Kansas' Mary Meyer in the Lady 'Cats' loss Saturday.

Lady 'Cats to face ISU Cyclones

Hoping to rebound from their recent loss to the University of Kansas, the Lady 'Cats basketball squad will play host to the Iowa State Cyclones at 7:30 p.m. today in Ahearn Field House.

The Cyclones, who lost to the University of Oklahoma Jan. 28, are 3-14 overall and 0-4 in the Big Eight. They lost a slim 55-53 decision to KU, who was a 71-58 winner Saturday over K-State.

The seventh-ranked Lady 'Cats are 13-4 overall and 3-1 in conference play following Saturday's loss. They share the conference lead with Kansas and Missouri.

Iowa State will be led by Tonya Burns, a six-foot-one junior averaging 15.5 points a contest. Burns is also the Big Eight's second leading rebounder, grabbing nine caroms per contest.

K-State will counter with the double-figure scoring of senior Angie Bonner, sophomore Cassandra Jones and sophomore Jennifer Jones. Bonner, who averages 12.9 points and 5.6 rebounds a game, scored 15 in the 'Cats' loss to KU. Cassandra Jones, who scored 16 points against the Lady Jayhawks, and Jennifer Jones are both contributing 12 points a game. Jennifer was held to just six points in the KU defeat.

K-State won both contests against the Cyclones last season.

"Kansas State always plays well on its home court," said Cyclone Coach Debbie Qing. "They are a big, physical team that can run and press, but I think it is a team that we can be competitive against. We want to be in the game for 40 minutes and play good basketball. It is important emotionally for us to be in the game the second half."

City organization criticizes residential zoning changes

KAREN BELLUS
Staff Writer

A local organization is protesting proposed zoning in Manhattan.

The Older Manhattan Neighborhoods Association recently adopted a position statement criticizing the proposed introduction of new apartment complexes into established high-density residential areas, said Micheal O'Neil, assistant professor of philosophy and president of OMNA.

"The first area to be considered is the area which runs east of campus, south of Ratone Street and over to Poyntz Avenue," he said.

In the statement, OMNA proposes that the Urban Area Land Use Plan be revised to eliminate the corridor of high-density housing from the University to the downtown; the City Commission rezoned all multi-family residential areas between Poyntz Avenue and Ratone Street to two-family residential areas; and a new zone be created to accommodate the remaining multi-family residential areas.

The Urban Area Land Use Plan, adopted by the City Planning Board in 1966, proposes a corridor of high density housing between two areas of high activity, the K-State campus and downtown Manhattan.

Although the land use plan is not law, the City Commission follows it closely when making zoning decisions, O'Neil said.

"The land use plan is taken very seriously by the courts," he said. In many urban areas around the country, it is common to establish such a corridor, O'Neil said.

"It is traditional planning in large cities to have high-density housing intermixed with commercial buildings," he said.

According to the position statement, the land use plan justifies the corridor by saying there will be a large demand for housing in this area.

OMNA holds that such corridors are not appropriate for Manhattan.

Successful corridors are in areas where access to commercial activities and jobs are dependent on mass transit or are within walking distance, O'Neil said. The proposed area is already a high-density residential area with no mass transit system and widespread car ownership, and would thus create a parking problem.

"The plan predicted students would want to live near commercial activities, but student housing patterns suggest students tend to huddle around the University," he said.

In addition, the statement charges high-density housing in older neighborhoods would "lead to their gradual degradation and eventual destruction."

OMNA also proposes that the commission rezone two-family and multi-family residential areas. Rezoning would, according to the position statement, be the "simplest and easiest way to eliminate the syndrome of big boxes surrounded by a sea of concrete and more cars on the street."

OMNA has proposed rezoning laws which would ban apartment complexes in older neighborhoods, while also providing an area zoned specifically for multi-resident housing.

According to OMNA, banning apartment complexes from older neighborhoods would "restore to a large area of Manhattan the sense that it is still a neighborhood, a nice place to live where families and students and people of different income groups and lifestyles can live next to one another."

Association handles housing woes

TOM SCHULTES
Collegian Reporter

Some Manhattan residents have a method of recourse when they encounter housing controversies—the Older Manhattan Neighborhoods Association.

Michael O'Neil, assistant professor of philosophy and current president of OMNA, said the association serves as a watchdog for the area located east of Sunset Avenue and south of Ratone Street.

The goals of the association are to preserve and enhance the older areas of Manhattan as a sound residential and commercial community, he said.

O'Neil said the organization originated in an effort to save the building which is now Manhattan Middle School.

During the early 1970s, the Manhattan Board of Education planned to abandon the building which had served as Manhattan High School and to replace it with a new structure on the west edge of Manhattan. An ad hoc committee was then formed to save the building, he said.

Many of the original committee members were from cities which had abandoned downtown neighborhoods during a period of suburban construction. Members claimed this led to a decay of inner-city areas, O'Neil said.

O'Neil said the committee achieved its goal of saving the building when a school bond proposal was defeated. That was the only time a school bond issue had been defeated in Manhattan, he said.

O'Neil said OMNA currently has approximately 250 members, but members are not required to live within the area served by OMNA.

"OMNA doesn't really have any power," O'Neil said. "We do try to exert some influence. Some of our fundamental goals are best met by some (Urban Area Land Use Board and Zoning Appeals Board) board members who are sympathetic to our causes."

O'Neil is a member of the Zoning Appeals Board.

In recent years, much of OMNA's energy had been directed toward support of the downtown mall issue. The underlying concern was revitalization of the downtown business district, O'Neil said.

This concern spurred the organization's opposition to three different proposals regarding construction of shopping malls on the west side of Manhattan.

Shopping mall construction would have eroded the commercial integrity of the downtown area, O'Neil said.

Shultz arrives in El Salvador, condemns terrorist activities

By The Associated Press

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Secretary of State George P. Shultz said Tuesday he was "proud to stand together" with the Salvadoran government, and he assailed violence by both leftist guerrillas and rightist death squads.

Arriving at San Salvador's airport, Shultz called the leftist insurgency a "totalitarian" movement that "depends on outside support" for its survival.

"Our enemies are weak," he said. "They represent forces that are foreign to this hemisphere and offer only totalitarianism."

Shultz asserted that "the tactics of totalitarian terror and the death squads have no place in a democracy."

Shultz's visit to El Salvador, the first stop of a five-nation tour of Latin America and the Caribbean, was seen as a bid to boost the morale of a Salvadoran government attempting to come to grips with the problems of uninterrupted warfare and a faltering economy.

En route from Washington, he told reporters he planned to encourage the government to continue its "definite movement" toward curbing the death squads.

He said that if politically motivated killings go unpunished, "the ability of the United States to maintain the level of support which we want to maintain is going to be very seriously damaged."

Afterward, Shultz had lunch with President Alvaro Magana and the six candidates competing in presidential elections scheduled for March 25. Among them was Roberto d'Aubuisson, El Salvador's most prominent rightist leader, who has claimed that American interference is impeding the Salvadoran army's effort to defeat the guerrillas.

American officials believe d'Aubuisson has ties to rightist death squads. Two months ago, the State Department turned down his request for a visa to visit Miami.

Shultz met briefly with d'Aubuisson and said later that the former army major had assured him of his commitment to the democratic process.

In a toast at the luncheon, Shultz said that since the 1982 election of the Constituent Assembly, the level of political violence directed at civilians has been one-third or one-fourth the level of the previous two years.

"Our two governments agree that much remains to be done," Shultz said. "Death squads and terror have no place in a democracy and I mince no words saying it here or anywhere else."

"The judicial system must prove its capacity to cope with the terrorist acts of extremists of the right or left," he added.

Shultz planned to fly to Venezuela in the early evening.

On the eve of Shultz's arrival in El Salvador, the leftist guerrilla Radio Farabundo Marti called the visit a "comedy...that no one believes in."

Shultz told reporters on the flight from Washington that the Magana government recently has been far more outspoken in denouncing rightist terror and that "a goodly portion" of officials with death squad links have been removed from positions of authority.

But he said the struggle to eliminate rightist terror must continue unabated.

Shultz's visit comes seven weeks before El Salvador elects a president to replace Magana, who has been serving on a provisional basis since May 2, 1982.

Democrats act for Marine withdrawal

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Impatient with President Reagan's call to stand firm in Lebanon, House Democratic leaders Tuesday proposed a resolution calling for the "prompt and orderly withdrawal" of all U.S. forces from Lebanon.

The plan, endorsed by House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, D-Mass., and other senior House Democrats, does not set a specific timetable for the pullout but calls for a progress report from the president within 30 days of passage.

Other congressional sources, speaking only on condition that they not be identified, said any measure with a specific pullout date would risk a presidential veto and jeopardize Republican support, especially in the Senate.

A preliminary version of the House resolution, which is subject to change, asks Reagan to meet with congressional leaders within seven days of the bill's passage to discuss a Marine withdrawal, and to give Congress a specific pullout plan within an additional 30 days, the congressional sources said.

"We want to bring those boys home as quickly and as safely as we can," O'Neill told reporters late Tuesday after discussing the measure with a special House advisory committee he commissioned to study the Lebanon situation.

O'Neill said the resolution would be presented to the full House Democratic membership at a party caucus today and then brought to the House floor sometime within the month.

The resolution would not have the force of law and would not require the president's signature, although House leaders said they expected the proposal to be sent to the Republican-controlled Senate.

The proposed resolution calls for "the prompt and orderly withdrawal of our Marines in the multi-national force in Lebanon."

Asked what "prompt and orderly withdrawal" meant, O'Neill told reporters: "prompt removal is immediate or right away."

Last fall, O'Neill supported legislation that allows the Marines to remain in Lebanon through mid-April 1985. But now, O'Neill said, he can no longer support such a mission.

An earlier draft of the resolution would have given Reagan 30 days to come up with a plan for the withdrawal.

But the new, more strongly worded, version directs him to begin the withdrawal right away, and then to report to Congress 30 days after the resolution is adopted on what he has done to accomplish the withdrawal.

House Minority Whip Trent Lott, R-Miss., said he "would like no resolution."

"We'd like to see exactly what they're talking about. It's still a possibility we could support something, but it depends on what's in it."

The resolution was drafted by Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., and other leading Democrats, who then presented it to O'Neill for the speaker's approval Tuesday.

The resolution would express only the sense of Congress, where a growing number of legislators of both parties are calling for an early withdrawal from Beirut, where 259 American servicemen in the multinational peacekeeping force have been killed.

Crews to dismantle Wichita-area missiles

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The 17 aging Titan II missiles based in silos near McConnell Air Force Base near Wichita will be the next targets for dismantling, according to sources familiar with Air Force plans for retiring the missile system.

Crews have been dismantling Titans ringing Davis Monahan Air Force Base near Tucson, Ariz., since late 1982, and will turn their attention to the Kansas site as early as late this summer, according to the sources, who spoke only on condition they not be named.

The decision by Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger means that the third Titan site, Little Rock Air Force Base in Arkansas, will be last in line for decommissioning of the aging, leaky liquid-fueled missiles.

The decision also brings increased pressure for a decision on what kind of mission will be assigned to the base near Wichita to replace the Titan wing, which has been the primary reason for McConnell's existence.

Exactly when the dismantling crews will move to Kansas depends in part upon the final decision on McConnell's new mission, one of the sources said. Members of the Kansas congressional delegation, led by Republican Sen. Robert Dole, have been pressing Weinberger to designate McConnell as the home base for a wing of new B-1 bombers.

One base, in Texas, already has been designated, and the site for another B-1 wing may be announced when President Reagan's fiscal year 1985 budget is unveiled today, Air Force Secretary Verne Orr has said. Four other homes for the bomber are to be selected later this year.

It has been estimated that the Titan wing at McConnell, with 17 underground silos spread in the south-central Kansas countryside, helps bring in about $30 million a year into the local economy, and civic leaders in Wichita have been concerned about losing that infusion of federal cash.

Weinberger announced Sept. 23, 1981 that the Titan II fleet, the last of the nation's early-generation nuclear missile arsenal, would be taken out of service to help meet Reagan administration budget goals for defense spending.

U.S. reports large increase in home sales

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The government's main economic forecasting gauge climbed 0.6 percent in December with the Reagan administration proclaiming the increase offers new evidence of good economic times through 1984.

In one of the most striking indications of just how far the economy has come back, the government also reported Tuesday that new home sales climbed by about 52 percent in 1983, the biggest yearly increase ever.

But some private analysts saw last month's small rise in the Index of Leading Economic Indicators as a sign that while the recovery isn't about to fizzle, growth in 1984 will not be as robust as 1983.

The Commerce Department said the index climbed in December for the 15th month out of the past 16. Only in November did the index decline, but the department revised the extent of the drop to a scant 0.2 percent from the earlier estimate of 0.4 percent.

Administration officials were quick to proclaim that December's figures bolstered their belief that the economic recovery will continue unabated through this election year.

Presidential spokesman Larry Speakes said the increase was "very healthy indeed...We've established solid groundwork for the recovery that will continue to bear fruit in 1984."

Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige said the growth came following "November's modest setback. With every monthly improvement in the leading index, the roots of this economic expansion grow deeper."

John Albertine, president of the American Business Conference, a coalition of high-growth companies, said the December figure "confounds the doomsayers who have been sounding the death knell for this recovery...I feel we are in for many more months of solid economic growth with low inflation."

But some private analysts said the December numbers pointed to a definite slowdown in economic growth.

"If you take out consumer credit, the index has been virtually flat for the past two months," said Michael Evans, who heads a Washington-based economic consulting firm.

Allen Sinai of Lehman Brothers Kuhn Loeb Inc. said the November decline and modest December increase showed that "the economy's boom-like pace of 1983 is going to settle down into a slower growth pattern in 1984."

Fewer candidates contend for Student Senate posts

There are fewer candidates running in next week's student government elections than ran a year ago.

According to Student Governing Association figures, 50 fewer candidates filed for Student Senate positions. Eighty-three candidates filed for 51 positions, as compared to the 133 candidates who filed for 55 positions in 1983.

The biggest drop in the number of candidates occurred in the Colleges of Arts and Sciences, Business Administration and Engineering.

In the College of Arts and Sciences, 34 candidates filed last year. Only 22 candidates will be on the ballot next week.

The College of Business Administration has 16 candidates for eight positions, down from 27 in 1983.

The College of Engineering has experienced a drop of 11 candidates. Only 13 candidates filed for positions in this year, while 24 candidates filed a year ago.

The number of candidates filing for the office of Student Body President this year is the same as in 1983 — six.

Those filing included Dana Hawkins, senior in journalism and mass communications, Ken Heinz, junior in computer science and accounting, Bruce Jacks, junior in engineering technology, Kent Jaecke, junior in animal science and industry, Eddie Rodriguez, sophomore in pre-law, and Tracy Turner, junior in economics.

Jacks, Jaecke and Rodriguez failed to meet the deadline to file their initial expenditure reports and their names will not appear on the ballot.

Rodriguez said he would appeal the decision to Tribunal. He said he would still run as a write-in candidate if his appeal is denied.

Jacks and Jaecke said they are no longer considering themselves as candidates.

Fewer candidates also filed for positions on the Board of Student Publications. Six candidates filed for four positions this year, down from 10 a year ago.

The general election will be held Feb. 8.

Senate approves proposal for future state water needs

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Senate passed and forwarded to the House on Tuesday a package of three proposals to help prepare the state for future water needs of its citizens.

Passed on 39-0 roll call votes, the measures would place restrictions on all water appropriations in the future to protect streamflows, set forth a procedure for adoption of a new state water plan and direct the state to negotiate the purchase of additional water storage capacity in federal reservoirs in Kansas.

"We are moving into the whole process of water planning," said Sen. Charlie Angell, R-Plains, as he explained the water bills during debate.

This session, lawmakers are to consider a proposal by the Kansas Water Office to establish standards for minimum streamflows in four south-central Kansas rivers.

Similar streamflow requirements will be set for other rivers in coming years, and the water appropriations bill is to guard against overuse of those streams and rivers until streamflow standards are in effect statewide.

Angell said it could take four to six years before all of the standards are completed and state officials are concerned people may apply for water appropriations, the legal right to use water, to beat implementation of the water standards.

"If we let that happen we may not have any streamflows left to protect four to six years from now," said Angell.

The bill would condition all future water appropriations to streamflow

Recreation students earn awards

Lynda Frey, executive director of the Riley County American Red Cross, and Darrell Marr, chairman, presented the awards to the students.

The students successfully completed the requirements necessary to become instructors in the Red Cross "The Name of the Game is Caring" program. The program is directed toward developing recreation and leadership for youth in grades 7-12. K-State is one of the first universities to offer this program in conjunction with the American Red Cross.

Chicago architect to lecture

Chicago architect John Hartray will be an Oscar Ekdahl Memorial lecturer for K-State's College of Architecture and Design on Monday.

Hartray, a principal in the firm of Nagle, Hartray & Associates Ltd., will speak on "Chicago's 150 Years of Modern Architecture" at 3:30 p.m. in the Union Forum Hall. The public is invited.

The Ekdahl lectureship in architecture and design was established through a bequest to the KSU Foundation from the estate of a prominent Topeka architect and one of K-State's distinguished graduates. Ekdahl lecturers traditionally meet with students and faculty and visit studio classes.

A 1954 Cornell University architecture graduate, Hartray is a fellow of the American Institute of Architects and a frequent lecturer and visiting critic for educational institutions. He is an adjunct professor at the Illinois Institute of Technology and lectures on construction technology for the Chicago School of Architecture.

Artist to give lecture, slide show

Keith Achepohl, whose work currently is on display at the Union Art Gallery, will give a lecture and slide presentation at 6:30 p.m. Thursday in the Union Little Theater.

The lecture is free and open to the public, and a reception for the artist will follow in the gallery.

Achepohl is a professor of art at the University of Iowa. He has exhibited widely and his work is exhibited in many museums, including the National Museum of American Art.

Plains architecture series resumes

"Architecture from the Plains," a year-long series of exhibits and presentations at K-State, resumes with a show by Horst, Terrill & Karst Architects, P.A., of Topeka, throughout next week.

Gary Karst, vice president and director of design for the firm, will make a presentation describing the philosophy, organization and design methods from which the firm's buildings spring at 7:30 p.m. Feb. 8 in Durland 173.

Karst is a K-State graduate and a former president of the Kansas Society of Architects.

"Architecture from the Plains" exhibits and presentations are open to the public without charge through sponsorship of the K-State Department of Architecture, with cooperation of the K-State student chapter of the American Institute of Architects.

Professor obtains research grant

John Iandolo, professor of biology, has received a grant totaling $221,130 from the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, National Institutes of Health, for a project titled, "Studies on Staphylococcal Enterotoxin."

This study is directed toward the construction of generalized models of toxin biosynthesis. The results gathered from this work will be used to determine the significance of toxigenesis to the microbe and perhaps aid in later studies on the mode of action of the toxin in animal systems.

U-Learn Line

Can you tell me what the Student Activity Fee is used for?

The student activity fee is $25.25 for full-time students and $12.20 for part-time students. This portion of your tuition is allocated by Student Senate.

The total amount generated by the activity fee for 1983-84 was $797,612.52. Groups receive allocations which amount to 75 percent of the total sum. These "line items" include: Associated Students of Kansas (ASK), Fine Arts Council, K-State Union, Recreational Services and Student Publications.

The remaining 25 percent of the fee is allocated to college councils, who then re-allocate the funds to departmental interest groups (judging teams, etc.); Social Services (such as Consumer Relations Board); Minority Student Groups; KSBD, the University's radio station; International Coordinating Council; debate team; and many others.

Why do students have to pay a health fee?

When the University established a Lafene Student Health Center, the Board of Regents mandated that every student would help support it. Because the students react with and live in the community, it is seen as a University responsibility to help maintain the health of the community and the students.

A description of the fees and services of Lafene Student Health Center is in the University General Catalog.

I'm graduating in May. What do I need to know?

Election victor influences justice

The victor in November's presidential election may win the power of nominating several new Supreme Court justices — depending on the longevity of the individuals now serving.

Of the nine Supreme Court justices, five of them are 75 years old or older. Of the remaining justices, only Sandra Day O'Connor, 53, will still be under 60 by election day.

Every full-term president has appointed at least one justice except Jimmy Carter. In recent years, with the increase in the life-expectancy rate, the turnover of Supreme Court justices has become stable, if not stagnant.

The last two justices to be nominated were John Paul Stevens in 1975 by Gerald Ford and O'Connor in 1981 by Ronald Reagan.

Presidents normally nominate justices who hold the same convictions they do. The individual nominated is expected to make decisions that would agree with the president. However, this has not always been the case.

For example, President Dwight Eisenhower nominated Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justice William Brennan Jr. to Supreme Court seats. To Eisenhower's dismay, both men became leading court liberals.

Today's court has four liberal members — Brennan, 77; Thurgood Marshall, 75; Harry Blackmun, 75; Stevens, 63 — and four conservative judges — Warren Burger, 75; Lewis Powell Jr., 76; William Rehnquist, 59, and O'Connor, 53. Justice Byron White, 66, was appointed by John F. Kennedy and has been both conservative and liberal in his decisions.

Two of the conservative judges and three of the liberal justices are 75 or older. Theoretically, the court could lose its balance and become strongly conservative or liberal, depending upon the next president and whether the Supreme Court seats are vacated.

This fact should be a major issue of this year's presidential race. A president's influence lives on in the Supreme Court long after he leaves office. If a drastic turnover takes place during the next administration, it could be 20 or more years before the court would have the opportunity to become balanced again.

This is an important issue to keep in mind on election day. The next president could be voted out four years after he takes office. Supreme Court justices appointed in the next presidential term could serve for many more years. If Reagan is re-elected, his ultra-conservative influence could permeate American justice for years to come.

American death again in Beirut

Death has again struck an American in Beirut.

Lance Cpl. George L. Dramis of Cape May, N.J., died Monday as a result of casualties suffered in a succession of firings between the U.S. Marines stationed in Beirut and Shiite Moslem militia.

Two Lebanese civilians and a 9-year-old girl were also reported killed, and between both sides, 29 were wounded. The fighting began in midmorning and lasted into the night.

Dramis was the 259th American serviceman to die while stationed as part of a peacekeeping force in Beirut.

According to a Marines spokesman, all firing Monday was in self-defense against Shiite attack.

The question must be repeated in light of the growing seriousness of the conflict in Beirut: are our Marines effectively keeping the peace? The answer is no. Their presence only serves to invoke Lebanese ire.

President Reagan, in his State of the Union address last week, commended the Marine presence in Lebanon as instrumental in enforcing peace in the region. What Reagan is unaware of is how much the Lebanese resent the servicemen's presence in their country. The assassination this month of the president of the American University in Beirut, Malcolm Kerr, attests to the fact that violence will be used against Americans. Monday's fighting indicates it will continue.

Reagan would be smart to withdraw the Marines from Lebanon as soon as possible before more lives are lost and America becomes involved in a costly overseas conflict.

Biology course increases desire to learn...

Editor,

Re: Sheila Eppard's guest column, "Biology course needs improvement," in the Jan. 30 Collegian:

Eppard's column adequately expressed her frustrations with the Principles of Biology course, but some of her statistics and views require corrections. The average withdrawal percentage is 17 percent over the course of the whole semester, not in just the first few weeks. The average percent of F grades is 14, not 30 as Eppard reported overhearing. Eppard may find the correct statistics shocking as well, but they are very much in line with student performance in other freshman-sophomore science and math courses on this campus.

Eppard states that the review and supplemental sessions conflict with her schedule, but neglects to say that 14 hours of such sessions are offered per week. If she can't fit a couple of hours of these into her schedule, would offering even an additional 14 hours per week help her out?

The audio-tutorial format which Eppard finds so confusing was designed in the late 1960s to make the students more responsible for their own learning. The objectives of a week's work are clearly stated in print and the tape provides a set of organized directions about how to proceed, but it's up to the student to decide when to work and how long to work. There is always graduate and faculty help in the lab, but the student must ask for the help. There are, as previously stated, many hours of review and supplemental sessions, but the student must take the initiative to attend. Each semester students are asked to evaluate the course and one of the questions is: How have the teaching methods used in this course affected your motivation for learning biology (compared to a traditional lecture course)? The data from thousands of students state that for 20 percent it decreases motivation, for 29 percent it doesn't make any difference and for 51 percent the format increases the motivation to learn.

...and requires responsibility

Editor,

Re: Sheila Eppard's guest column, "Biology course needs improvement," in the Jan. 30 Collegian:

I must reply to Eppard's column slamming the Principles of Biology class. I have taken the class and found it a welcome change from the traditional lecture-notes-test format. In Principles of Biology, one teaches oneself — all the material is there, outlined, underlined, illustrated and magnified. Simply stated objectives are printed for each section, and there is no doubt as to what each test will cover and where to find the material. Help sessions are offered many different times during the week, and getting help from aides and teachers is stressed from day one.

I can understand some freshmen having difficulties — you are being treated in this class as an adult student who wants to learn. The responsibility is solely on you to observe living displays and demonstrations which show principles at work. If finding out on your own which corner of the room is the southeast corner is too difficult, then perhaps the course will be tough.

Eppard should be glad to have had a class that requires a little creative thinking — the world outside the campus is not in a lecture format.

Discussion necessary on coliseum funding

Editor,

Re: James W. Lero's letter, "Alumnus advocates funding for coliseum," in the Jan. 24 Collegian:

On Jan. 13, an article I wrote was printed in the Collegian in which I expressed concern pertaining to the $20 million coliseum in light of financial problems confronting education at K-State.

The questions I posed were intended to invite readers to evaluate their roles at K-State and the goals and priorities of K-State as an educational institution. The questions were aimed at bringing to light the need for evaluating these goals and priorities. They were not in themselves intended to be specific alternatives for the dispensing of $20 million.

I wish to express my thanks to Lero for his correction on the tax break item. I also would like to point out, however, that the remainder of his references to my column were inaccurate and misleading.

Lero was quick to draw details from my column and twist them entirely out of context. At the same time, he completely neglected to address the principal theme: the need for evaluating the goals of K-State and the coliseum's role in achieving these goals. For these reasons, I urge everyone to examine the articles side by side and compare the context.

An example of the attitude Lero apparently espouses reveals itself in his closing statement: "I suggest that if Dubois wishes to improve educational facilities that he lead his own private fund-raising campaign, and that he ask the students for fee increases to pay for the buildings."

This statement seems to imply that Lero feels neither I nor anyone else has any business raising questions concerning the coliseum.

The people of K-State and of the community are all affected by major policy decisions of the University. We not only have the right to make these issues our business, we have the responsibility to evaluate major policy decisions of the University.

Newspapers alone lack the complete environment necessary for a thorough discussion of a major issue. I therefore propose that a well-organized public forum be held to resolve questions and doubts concerning the proposed coliseum. I propose that those conducting the coliseum drive, including administrative officials, be on hand to present their points of view and answer questions. Likewise, people such as Lero and myself could exchange ideas and opinions in an atmosphere more conducive to accurate interpretation.

A willingness to communicate in such an environment could resolve many questions and misunderstandings. Conversely, refusal to do so could only reinforce and justify concerns.

Political awareness needed

Editor,

To the hundreds of students on this campus who made an effort, but were unable to get a seat in McCain Auditorium to hear Sen. Edward Kennedy speak at the 61st Landon Lecture, my regrets. But my sympathies lie with those who showed no interest in attending.

Kennedy's speech, one of the best in the series I have heard so far, brought home several messages.

The most vital of all was that we no longer live isolated in today's world, but decisions made by those in power have or could have global repercussions.

May we on this campus seek to become more enlightened on international issues. Ignorance is not bliss.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR pertaining to matters of public interest are encouraged. All letters must be typewritten or neatly printed, signed by the author and should not exceed 300 words.

Old Royal has years of experience

"You still type with that thing?"

I looked up at the questioner. I couldn't understand what he was trying to ask, so I ignored him.

"That typewriter must be ancient."

Oops — wrong thing to say to a man who has a manual typewriter. True, the old Royal had seen better days, but it's like any man's prized possession. You don't make fun of cars and typewriters, I thought.

"Yes, I guess it is a bit ancient," I said, trying to ignore the questioner, "but it still works."

"No kidding."

He was saved by the bell — Ma Bell, that is. The phone rang. I picked up the receiver. No one there.

My Nemesis left during the phone call. His absence allowed me to get back to work, yet his questions made me think about the old Royal.

It's a solid model. I don't know when it was made, because there isn't any date stamped on it. My parents bought it a long time ago. I brought it with me to college. The folks bought an electric typewriter and offered to let me bring it back to college, but I couldn't part with the old Royal.

The thing weighs a ton, I think. It is a desk model, but it is portable in the Army sense: weld a couple of handles on it, and it can be carried anywhere.

It has its idiosyncrasies. It doesn't always load the paper properly. The Royal can be a royal pain about taking in pre-printed papers...especially applications. I think the thing is jealous of the pre-printed lines.

The old typewriter also tends to skip a little. The faster one types, the more it skips. It is a part of banging on the keys, I guess.

As smart as the old thing is, it still has trouble spelling. Just ask my editor.

I learned to type on the old Royal. I used the two-finger method for years. I found I could type 30 words per minute with that method. It wasn't perfect, but I found my way around the keyboard with lots of practice.

My first news stories were typed on the old gray beast. It seems like it was a long time ago since I covered the local beauty pageant for my high school paper. The old Royal had the privilege of hammering out stories and editorials, papers and projects.

Yes, I mean "hammering." Learning to type on a manual typewriter does build the finger muscles, and the electric typewriters and video display terminal keyboards sure take a beating whenever I'm around. Old habits are hard to break. Keyboards, unfortunately, aren't.

I did take a typing class. I took it at night during the spring semester of my senior year in high school. I learned to type 30 words per minute with both hands...even though I could type 30 words per minute with the two index fingers. The old Royal didn't care...at least, I don't think it cared.

The great beast has elite type. For those who think this is gold type, I'm sorry to tell you this. Elite type is small...12 characters per inch. Pica typewriters have 10 characters per inch. What does this mean? If a teacher assigned reports to be three to five typewritten pages, it meant I

Advising procedures often cause confusion

By KATHLEEN COLE
Collegian Reporter

Long lines, sign-up lists, last minute changes, lost lunch hours and frantic faces — that's how some students describe advising.

According to the University General Catalog, faculty advisers "assist students in defining goals to be reached in college, give information regarding appropriate curricula and courses, and discuss personal problems students may have, especially problems related to a student's progress and plans for subsequent work." These advisers, the catalog states, are "available to students any time they need help."

Students who use the catalog as a guide when they enter the University may note the passage that states "all new students are assigned faculty advisers at the beginning of the school year."

However, Cindy Hong, freshman in chemical engineering, said she was not assigned an adviser until she requested one.

"The secretary asked me for my adviser's name when I called," Hong said. "I said I didn't know because I was a new student. She said she would assign me to someone and gave me his name."

Cheryl Polson, temporary instructor of continuing education and coordinator of the Non-Traditional Study Program said, "The field of advising is still in its infancy stage. 'Research results necessary for developing the tools to measure effectiveness are yet unavailable.'"

Research is currently underway to identify methods for systematically evaluating effective advising, Polson said.

Polson said K-State is not unlike other colleges throughout the nation, where faculty members are not formally trained to provide advising.

In departments where students are required to see advisers regularly and obtain their signature to enroll, time becomes a serious concern in the advising period prior to pre-enrollment. Faculty members are forced to limit the length of their advising sessions to accommodate all their students.

"Sometimes, during summer pre-enrollment, I have to see 50 students a day," Linda Mitchell, academic adviser in the College of Arts and Sciences, said.

Mitchell said she would prefer to have more time to spend with individuals, but cutbacks in staff have forced her to use a group-advising approach.

"What I find most disturbing about the advising system is the sense of irregularity," Mitchell said. "Some students are getting advising, others are not."

Other departments try to temper the advising rush by making advising optional to students.

"The mandatory signature policy tends to become a form-signing session rather than an opportunity to establish relationships," William Miller, associate professor of architecture, said.

Miller said students in his department are not required to see an adviser or obtain their signature for enrollment. General information about the curricula is available in a department handbook, and students are urged to seek faculty advice if they have questions.

"This way students can seek out the kinds of information they need," Miller said. "It places the responsibility with students to take charge of their own affairs."

Still, there are some who believe in the merits of the mandatory advising system.

"I've always felt like I needed an adviser, especially in my freshman and sophomore years," Steve Onken, junior in journalism and mass communications, said.

"Before I switched majors, I was in a department that didn't require us to see an adviser," Onken said. "I really didn't know what my responsibilities were."

"By the end of my freshman year I was beginning to feel like a lost student. I wasn't sure what course of study I wanted to pursue. I only knew I was unhappy, so I ended up switching majors," Onken said.

"I'm not sure an assigned adviser would have swayed my decision to switch majors, but an adviser might have helped me."

Some faculty advisers cite a lack of incentives as a major weakness in the advising system. Those who must advise — in addition to doing research and teaching — indicate the need for measurable benefits in terms of salary increases and tenure.

One way advisers are able to handle problems that require skills beyond their expertise is through use of other campus services.

Professional counselors are available in the Counseling Center in Holton Hall. They offer students help with academic, career and personal concerns.

The University Learning Enhancement Resource Network (U-LeaRN), located in the basement of Holton Hall, is designed to assist students with skill development. A variety of related workshops, seminars and resource information help students in areas such as career exploration, study skills and choosing a major.

The National Academic Advising Association (NACADA) also attempts to address the problems of advising. NACADA is dedicated to promoting quality in academic advising and education and is utilized by a number of K-State advisers. The organization is comprised of faculty and students who are interested in the field.

Organizations like NACADA and campus services serve to supplement and provide options to faculty advisers. Despite the variety of alternatives, some students would rather advise themselves.

"I don't use an adviser," Brian Orloff, senior in business administration, said. "The department provides an adequate amount of information for students to determine what requirements they need to graduate."

Program aids new students with studies

By KATHLEEN COLE
Collegian Reporter

Graduation may be an easier goal to attain now for some freshmen participating in a new advising and study skills program introduced last summer by the Academic Assistance Center.

The program, initiated at summer pre-enrollment, involves about 200 students from the College of Arts and Sciences. It is aimed at helping students who, upon entering the University, were undecided about their majors and had below-average ACT scores.

"Most students finished the semester in good academic standing," said Mike Lynch, assistant director of student development and director of academic assistance, referring to the effectiveness of the program.

The students were assigned an adviser and encouraged to enroll in both a three-credit study skills lab and a nine-credit block of standard University required courses.

The labs, which meet Monday, Wednesday and Friday, are taught once a week by advisers. This gives the freshmen a chance to interact with their advisers on a regular basis and makes it easier for faculty to track students' progress.

Skills taught in the lab focus on time management, taking notes, studying for tests and other areas designed to improve learning. Two meetings a week are devoted to the direct application of these skills to the University's required courses.

"We try to teach study or learning skills in the context of the course," Lynch said.

"We want to accomplish two things. We want to get students off to a good start with academics and advising in the first semester, and we also want them to complete at least 12 hours of course work," he said.

Staff/John Sleezer

Mike Lynch, assistant director of student development and director of academic assistance, is part of the new advising and study skills program begun last summer by the Academic Assistance Center.

In addition to courses specifically outlined by the program, Lynch said students could choose classes of personal interest to explore other areas, while still establishing a foundation of courses that would apply to a wide range of majors.

The idea for the program was not original, Lynch said. It was modeled after a supplemental instruction program used by the University of Missouri at Kansas City.

Modifications have been added, with advising being built into the K-State program.

"We chose to work with the College of Arts and Sciences because it represents a sizable group of freshmen who enroll as undeclared majors," Lynch said. "Our research has shown that if students successfully complete the first two years, chances are good they'll graduate."

Preliminary response to the program is promising, Lynch said. Fewer students dropped courses, and the number of students returning second semester indicated a positive response to the program.

"The critical test will be whether students come back for their sophomore year," Lynch said.

The program is currently in its second semester now, and there are plans to expand it next fall, depending on the resources available, Lynch said.

Inquiry sought in youth's hanging

INDEPENDENCE, Mo. — The parents of a 13-year-old found hanging in his room at the Jackson County Juvenile Justice Center over the weekend plan to ask for a formal inquest into the boy's death.

The boy's stepfather, Gale Tolbert, said Monday that he and his wife, Jenny, want to know why supervisors at the center failed to stop their son, Jamie Bonacci, from barricading the door to his room and hanging himself with an elastic bandage.

"I know everyone's human," Tolbert said. "But this is one hell of a mistake to make. He shouldn't be dead. There's no reason for that, especially by his own hand."

After the boy is buried, the family will ask Juvenile Court Judge William J. Marsh of the Jackson County Circuit Court to investigate the circumstances of Jamie's death, Tolbert said.

The boy was placed at the center about three weeks ago by his parents because of discipline problems at home and school. The center provides supervised, live-in counseling programs.

The boy hanged himself early Sunday afternoon after he and another juvenile were told they would be punished for arguing, authorities said. Staff members at the center found the body a short time later, after forcing their way into his room.

A nice place to visit, but...

MANCHESTER, England — British stage stars Tom Courtenay and Julie Walters, who won Golden Globe film awards in Hollywood over the weekend, on Tuesday dismissed the city of dreams as "nonsense."

"Hollywood is full of a lot of self-importance. And they're only talking about plays and films — it all gets a bit much," said Walters, who co-hosted the awards ceremony and won best actress award for her role as Rita in "Educating Rita."

"I only like Hollywood because I don't have to stay there."

Courtenay, who shared an award as best actor for his role in "The Dresser," said, "It'll be nice to do a bit of acting after all that Hollywood nonsense."

Walters is rehearsing for a stage production of Tom Stoppard's play "Jumpers" in the northwest industrial city of Manchester. Courtenay is directing the show.

Former governor back on radio

ANNAPOLIS, Md. — Former Gov. Marvin Mandel, who served time in a federal prison for corruption, is back on the radio. But this time, instead of fielding questions from reporters, he is playing the role of inquisitor.

Mandel is the host of a one-hour talk show which had its debut Monday on radio station WNAV in Annapolis.

"For the first time, I'm on the other side of the fence, asking questions instead of answering them," he said. "I had fun."

Mandel worked for a Baltimore radio station two years ago doing election-night commentary for the primary and general elections. Other than that, he has kept pretty much out of the public spotlight since he was released from a federal prison in Florida on Dec. 4, 1981, after serving 19 months.

Mandel was convicted by a federal jury on political corruption charges involving his acceptance of $350,000 worth of cash and gifts while he was governor in a scheme to fix favorable racing dates for a now-defunct race track. He was sentenced to three years in prison, but President Reagan commuted his sentence on Dec. 3, 1981.

South Africa disengages forces in war

By The Associated Press

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — South Africa announced Tuesday it was "disengaging" its forces in Angola, calling it a first step toward a cease-fire in the 17-year bush war in South-West Africa.

Prime Minister P.W. Botha told Parliament the disengagement was based on assurances received from the United States during a visit last week by Chester Crocker, assistant secretary of state for African affairs.

He would not disclose those assurances and would not define the "disengagement" precisely.

Asked at a news conference if South African forces would withdraw from Angola, Botha answered, "It might include a withdrawal, but there is more to it than that. It is the preparatory steps to enter a cease-fire."

He said progress depended on the response of the other parties in the dispute, including the Angolan government and the guerrillas of the South-West Africa People's Organization. SWAPO is fighting from Angolan bases to end South African rule over South-West Africa, also known as Namibia.

The mineral-rich territory lies along the Atlantic Ocean between South Africa and Angola.

South African troops conducted a six-week invasion of southern Angola in December and January, pushing more than 100 miles into the country. South Africa said it killed hundreds of Angolan and SWAPO soldiers.

In London, the SWAPO office said South Africa must negotiate any cease-fire directly with SWAPO leaders, and anything short of that was inadequate. However, the statement did not refer to the disengagement announcement directly and appeared to have been written before Botha's remarks were delivered.

"I would be very careful in regarding this as a breakthrough," said one Western diplomat, although another added, "It is a very important beginning." Both spoke on condition they not be identified.

Sam Nujoma, the SWAPO leader, said in Tanzania before the Botha announcement that the American initiatives were "a diplomatic ploy intended to hoodwink the people of Namibia." Radio Tanzania reported.

Angola's Marxist leaders had no reaction to the disengagement decision by the white-minority government of South Africa.

Crocker was in Tanzania for talks Wednesday with President Julius Nyerere, who supports SWAPO.

South Africa first offered a disengagement on Dec. 15, proposing a 30-day halt to action in Angola on condition that the Angolan government agreed not to exploit the step.

U.S. officials held secretive talks with an Angolan delegation in Cape Verde two weeks ago, and Crocker acknowledged he carried a message from Angola to South Africa when he came to Cape Town for talks Jan. 27-28.

Town eliminates TV habit during experiment

By The Associated Press

FARMINGTON, Conn. — This town's month-long experiment in kicking the television habit ended Tuesday, with backers claiming that up to a third of the residents went cold turkey and that many permanently reduced their dependence on the tube.

Ironically, the sponsors said a major contributor to the success of the project was all the publicity it got — from television.

TV news coverage of the program "immediately brought national and international attention on this community and virtually everyone in town was aware of it," School Superintendent William Streich said.

Streich estimated that at least one-third of the families with school-age children participated in the TV turnoff that started Jan. 3 in this affluent Hartford suburb of 16,000 people.

"In one elementary school 27 percent were still involved at the end of last week," he said.

Many who went along with the blackout said they made an exception for the National Football League playoff and Super Bowl games.

Continued TV restraint could be challenged by telecasts of the Winter Olympics this month.

But Betty Kelly, librarian at Wallace Elementary School, said most children have told her that after a month without television they are not going to watch as much in the future.

"They've found that they have survived," she said. "Not many people have gone cold turkey, but a lot have cut way down."

Nancy DeSalvo, president of the Farmington Library Council which sponsored the program, said it would be "naive" not to see a correlation between heavy television watching and low performance among students.

"I see the pre-school children who are looking at 30 hours a week. They are not speaking in more than two sentences and are not asking questions," she said.

"When I turned off the TV, I could do many more exciting things," Wallace Elementary fourth-grader Mary-Grace Vendola wrote in a school essay. "I would do my homework without rushing. I made several get-well cards for my aunt."

She said she is not permitted to watch TV on school nights, so quitting cold was "not so hard to do."

"I really think TV is a bad habit," she said.

DeSalvo said the council will soon start tracking the TV habits of 25 to 40 families in Farmington for four or five months.

Streich said he will measure the success of the program "by the number of children and adults in this community that will turn on their televisions in February and be more discriminating."

Those among the town's 2,600 schoolchildren who charted their families' viewing patterns since the beginning of January will turn in their data this week, with results to be announced by Feb. 9.

The Library Council is planning an awards ceremony for children and adults whose pledge cards show they blacked television out of their lives for the entire month.

Board allows continuance of tobacco sales in Union

The motion to ban tobacco sales in the Union died from lack of a second during the Union Governing Board's Tuesday meeting.

However, UGB discussed the reasoning behind the proposal by Louis Herman, assistant professor in mathematics.

Herman said he does not think the Union should be responsible for selling "drugs and poisons" to students. He said if a student wants to purchase tobacco from local stores, then that is the student's choice, but the Union should not contribute to student health hazards.

Concern was raised as to whether the cigarette machines in residence halls would be banned since they are owned by the Union. Walt Smith, Union director, said that decision would be up to the residence hall governing boards rather than UGB.

Concern also was raised about whether UGB has the authority to make this decision for students.

Many UGB members said they were confronted by students with concerns about their rights to purchase tobacco.

Rifle club announces match

Student and faculty rifle teams will be sharpening their marksmanship skills this week in preparation for the All-University Rifle Match Saturday through Friday.

This will be the fourth year for the event, John Klinedinst, senior drill instructor in military science and riflery instructor, said.

The match, which is sponsored by the K-State Rifle Club, will take place on the rifle range in the Military Science building and is open to full-time students and faculty members.

Teams of three may enter in the men's division, women's division or be represented to include residence halls, fraternities, sororities, faculty and staff, off-campus students and co-ed groups.

Participants will use single-shot, .22 caliber rifles at a distance of 50 feet. Slings, prone mats, spotter scopes, shooting gloves, jackets and 50 rounds also will be provided, Klinedinst said.

Registration is open through Friday, and a $9 fee will be charged for each team entry. One-hour practice times will be assigned prior to the match.

Engineering students learn robotics with 'Hero'

By KIMBERLY STOLLE
Collegian Reporter

He is made out of metal, but he can walk, talk and even play basketball. He is Hero I, the Department of Industrial Engineering's first mechanical robot.

Programmed by Danny McAnarney, Greg Pifer and Diana Stoner, all graduate students in industrial engineering, Hero has been used at K-State as an educational tool.

The robot is approximately 2 feet tall. It is barrel-shaped and has one appendage or arm.

Experiments have been performed with the robot in an upper-level robotics class to determine the various uses of a robot. Such experiments included attaching a temperature sensor to the robot so he could react to hot and cold stimuli. Another experiment was based on the idea of replacing a smoke detector with a robot who would approach a potential victim and warn him of fire, McAnarney said.

To fulfill requirements for a laboratory class, McAnarney, Pifer and Stoner made various programs for Hero which have been displayed at the Kansas State Fair in Hutchinson and at K-State's Open House. Hero's programs also were recently presented to visiting high school students.

Hero is used to promote both the department of industrial engineering and the University, McAnarney said.

The process of programming a robot is very complex. Every motion and sound must be separately programmed in the robot's memory.

"He (Hero) does things so fast. You can tell him to start walking and after he starts walking, you can tell him to start talking. You think he can walk and talk at the same time, but really he can't. It just looks like it. We tell him to walk, then talk," McAnarney said.

The voice of the robot is also a very complex matter.

There are hundreds of different sounds in the English language. For example, there are five ways to sound the letter "a." Each sound must be programmed separately in the robot for him to possess a working vocabulary, Stoner said.

With all the skills a robot possesses, his do not match or replace those of a human.

"It seems like a lot of people are worried about robots replacing people. Well, it seems like when robots do replace people, it's in hazardous environments, like the paint shop in a manufacturing place where you have hazardous fumes and things like that," McAnarney said.

Robots also are unable to make decisions.

"Most jobs a robot can do are just the ones that are going to be very competitive and take very little intelligence. A robot can only deal with a small set of problems," Pifer said.

"You are not going to see a super-intelligent robot, not in the immediate future," he said. "I would say probably not ever, because in order to get to that level of technological advancement, you would have to spend a lot of money on research and development."

Water issues

Water policy for Kansas may change

By RHONDA WESSEL
Agriculture Editor

Kansas will continue to be supplied with fresh water. However, water policy will be changing to accommodate the new era of limited supplies and increasing costs.

"Eastern Kansas, where most of the state's population is concentrated, doesn't have a water-supply crisis, but it does have a water-management crisis," Barry Flinchbaugh, associate professor of economics, said.

Eastern Kansas has enough potential water to last until 2020 if it is stored and "sensibly" distributed, Flinchbaugh said.

"That means the real issue will be who is going to make those distribution decisions — who will control our water supply," he said.

A water-supply plan was passed by the Kansas Senate Tuesday and will now be considered by the House. The plan has provisions for minimum stream flow, the purchase of remaining federal water from reservoirs built by the U.S. Army Corps and a procedure for the adoption of a new state water plan.

There are several alternatives to the legal water policy. These include maintaining the status quo, returning to common law doctrine, using the pure appropriation doctrine, further modifying the appropriation doctrine or appropriating water rights to the state.

"The question now before every Kansan is whether we should allocate this limited resource through the marketplace or use the political system. The invisible hand of the marketplace can control the allocation of our water supply, but if the public interest as interpreted through the political process wishes to alter that allocation through public policy, then alternative forms of control will be developed," he said.

If the rights to water are given to the state, permits may be issued or rules and regulations will be enforced. If it is left up to the marketplace, water will be allocated, as it is now, with water going to the highest bidder.

Agriculture is competing with industry, commerce, recreation and municipal interests, and governmental intervention is necessary if the water is to be allocated differently from going to the highest bidder in the market, he said.

"Agriculture's position is strong in terms of law and tradition. Its economic position as it competes with other uses is weakening. So, the issue of who will control our water policy in a state such as Kansas will command top priority attention during the remainder of this century," Flinchbaugh said.

In the next 20 to 30 years, communities will be under great pressure in the eastern part of the state and somewhat in the western section to find and develop water sources, he said.

"Public policy hammered out in the political arena among special interests will determine who controls our water supply and how it is allocated. Water policy will continually change as demands and influence change," he said.

Funding will be a major issue in the decision of water rights. Funds will have to cover purchasing storage, building of pipelines, conducting research and efficiently managing resources, he said.

"The future will provide a choice of a few large reservoirs and large pipelines or many small reservoirs in areas near where the water will be used. The choices of how water is stored for later use is an important part of the state water plan and could make difference whether some eastern communities grow, and in some instances whether they continue to exist," Jim Koelliker, associate professor of civil engineering, said.

Flinchbaugh said, "No simple answers exist to these complex questions. They require thought-provoking analysis.

"The institutional arrangement for carrying out water policy will be a key determinant of who will exercise control. Ultimate control, of course, rests with the people through the political process, but the day-to-day operation of politically determined policies are crucial," he said.

Koelliker said, "Until recently, the main concern with water quality was whether it was safe to drink or safe to swim in. Now that humans are aware that the earth's resources, especially fresh water, are limited, people have begun thinking of water quality also in terms of conservation, beauty and recreation as a common resource as important as the air we breathe.

"So, sensible use is everyone's concern, and control of water becomes an economic as well as a management issue," he said.

Water quality depends on what the water is going to be used for and the characteristics important to current — as well as subsequent — users. If conventional treatment methods can transform otherwise poor-quality water into safe drinking water, the water source may not be considered polluted, Koelliker said.

Agriculture's most common byproduct is sediment. It is not, however, a major pollution concern from the public health standpoint unless it contains pesticides or other harmful particles, he said.

"Our increased awareness and dedication to environmental as well as economic values for our water resources will likely assure us that we will have reasonably high quality water supplies in the foreseeable future," he said.

"We can no longer count upon the environment to be both our waste treatment system and our supply of uncontaminated raw products. This is especially true for water, a multiple-use resource which cannot serve as one user's waste treatment and disposal system and the next user's water supply," he said.

Soil unit uses model to test wind erosion

By LINDA MORRELL
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Wind Erosion Research Unit is currently participating in a national effort to determine an erosion productivity impact calculator (EPIC) model.

"We are studying the effect of erosion on soil productivity in this project," Leon Lyles, research leader of the unit, said.

The unit is part of the Agricultural Research Service of the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA).

"The model is being used as part of a natural resources inventory to estimate what will happen to soil resources over the next 50 years," Lyles said.

The model targets major land resource areas where erosion is critical, he said. Results of the testing will be announced in a 1985 report, he said.

The research on the EPIC model is only one part of studies conducted by the unit.

There are about 15 projects the unit examines at a given time involving three broad areas, Lyles said.

The first area involves study of the fundamentals of the erosion process, including the principles, mechanics and physics.

An example is the study of aggregate abrasion and the generation of dust during impact by sand or soil particles, Lyles said, adding that the size and weight of the aggregate and the speed and angle at which the aggregate impacts other particles also are determined in this study.

The second area of research is on the damage and the direct and indirect environmental impact of wind erosion.

One project in this area is the study of abrasive damage by moving soil particles on young crops, Lyles said.

The particles damage the consumable part of crops like lettuce and tomatoes, resulting in poorer quality of the crop, he said.

The third area of research is control practices.

The unit is determining the protective ability of growing row crops, including winter wheat, corn, soybeans, grain, sorghum, peanuts and cotton, Lyles said.

The investigation is done on these crops from the emergence point to about 18 inches, he said.

Crops used in this study are grown in the unit's greenhouse and are tested in one of the three wind tunnels at the unit — the largest tunnel being 54 feet long, 5 feet wide, and 8 feet tall. A stationary tunnel and a portable tunnel also are utilized in the research.

"The final recipient of our research is the general public," Lyles said. He said funds for the research unit are appropriated by Congress.

Unit personnel are responsible for writing the results of their study and determining the publication form, he said.

Most of the research results are published in scientific journals and in USDA and Kansas agriculture experiment publications, Lyles said.

The unit employs seven full-time employees, four graduate students and six undergraduate students.

Financial base creates strength for farm co-ops

By The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Cooperatives can provide services expected of them in "the new agriculture" only if they have the support of their membership, the president of the nation's largest regional farm cooperative said Tuesday.

Support is needed especially to meet the needs of young farmers who do not have the experience of their fathers and grandfathers who built cooperatives out of necessity, said Kenneth A. Nielsen, president of Farmland Industries Inc.

"How do we convince them that support is a prerequisite to their insistence on service and products at competitive cost," Nielsen said in a speech prepared for delivery at the annual meeting of the Missouri Institute of Cooperatives. "Service is one thing, but without strength, it's only a word."

Nielsen said the challenge facing cooperatives is to build a strong financial base for a lean system that can deliver products and services at a reasonable cost.

He referred to "the new agriculture" as the transition to more large and small farm operations at the expense of the middle-size, full-time family farms.

Energy costs decrease irrigation use on farms

By LINDA MORRELL
Collegian Reporter

Increasing cost of irrigation and a depleting water supply may cause some farmers to discontinue irrigating their crops, Morgan Powell, assistant professor of extension agricultural engineering, said.

"Energy costs are increasing and are likely to continue to cost more," Powell said.

"Most of the acreage irrigated does not have high value crops," he said. "Therefore, there will probably be a limit to the amount of land irrigated."

Electricity, diesel fuel and natural gas supply energy for running irrigation systems, Richard Black, associate professor of extension agricultural engineering, said.

Diesel and electric power are preferred for irrigation in the Manhattan area, but for western Kansas, the best option in terms of cost is natural gas, Black said.

However, electricity as a source of irrigation power is more convenient and accessible, Bill Ohlmeir, director of information for the Kansas Electric Cooperative, said.

Irrigation systems requiring large amounts of energy have remained at a high level, Ohlmeir said. He said that like homes, the cost of electricity for an irrigation system is based on kilowatt-hours.

Economic cost is not the only factor in determining whether to irrigate or not, Powell said. Depending on the area, some ground water supplies are shallower than others.

"I don't mean we're running out of water, just that high yielding wells don't produce as much (as in previous years)," he said. "In terms of the total amount, less than half of the supply is depleted."

Of the five ground water management districts in Kansas, district one, including Greeley, Sedwick, Scott and Lane counties, has the most shallow water supply, Powell said.

"I would guess that within the next five to 10 years, there will be a 25 to 30 percent decline in irrigation," he said.

Film questions belligerent punk rock culture

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Penelope Spheeris' documentary "The Decline of Western Civilization" is a numbing illustration of the boredom and aggression that permeated Los Angeles' punk rock scene of 1980. Spheeris focuses upon not just the live performances by bands such as X, Fear and Black Flag, but upon what the performers and their fans have to say about the punk rock scene.

The questions Spheeris asks are free of any theorizing, and the answers she gets are straightforward. When a Black Flag guitarist is asked why he has a mohawk haircut, he says, "I'm searching." "Searching for what?" he is asked.

"I don't know...but when I find it I'll know."

This type of answer is quite in step with the music. Punk rock is known for its immediacy. Its audience isn't simply watching some millionaire rock star; they are watching performers just trying to survive until the next song.

And they don't watch by just sitting on their hands. They are an active part of the music, jumping up and down while slashing their arms back and forth in a dance (pogoing) that trends a thin line between dancing and fighting. When the music starts, they dance off one another, throwing punches and elbows as if they were in a street fight. The security guards will let them beat one another up as long as they look like they are having fun.

Of all the bands in the film, the show is stolen by X. The only true accomplished guitarist in "The Decline of Western Civilization" is X's Billy Zoom. Instead of droning out simple two-chord riffs like the other bands, Zoom launches into rockabilly solos while taking a vintage Chuck Berry pose on stage. Some of the other guitarists are laughably bad, unable to sustain an interesting solo for more than the first few chords.

An ex-guitarist for the Germs explains that when the group's members first got their instruments, they couldn't play. The band would do things to camouflage this. Lead singer Darby Crash would smear himself with peanut butter and dive through broken glass, emerging with blood streaming down his body.

Crash is the apotheosis of the punk rock performer. On stage he is so drugged he forgets to sing into the microphone; he lets it drop to the stage until a roadie screams at him to pick it up. He stumbles in a daze about the stage, occasionally groaning a lyric.

Many of the best moments of the film are away from the stage, talking to the groups in their homes. Crash and his girlfriend fry bacon and eggs while telling about finding a dead man in their back yard. Apparently a house painter had fallen from his ladder and had lain undiscovered for days until Crash tripped over him. Before calling the police, they grabbed a camera and took pictures of one another as they rolled on the ground beside the dead painter.

"Didn't it upset you finding a dead body in your yard?" she was asked.

"No, because I hate painters," she replied.

Spheeris provides no central image around which to build the film. This causes it to meander at times, deviating from the film's polished style. Interviews with fans are used to open and close the film, with the subjects photographed in stark black-and-white. These images aren't strong enough to pull the bits and pieces together and make the film cohesive as a whole, but nearly all of the pieces are quite interesting.

Spheeris very effectively puts the film's audience into the concert scenes, using close-ups that give a claustrophobic effect. There is nowhere for the viewer to hide when the band members spit and kick at their fans. Members of Fear actually try to whip their audience into a frenzy, calling their fans every four-letter word they can think of. The audience spits back and rushes the stage, security guards pushing them back. Then the show begins. One guard says: "The perfect performance would create total madness."

"The Decline of Western Civilization" is not just a cheap exploitation film. Spheeris treats her subject with great reverence in an examination that is just as interesting sociologically as it is musically.

Proposed bill outlaws tobacco sales to minors

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Despite concerns the law would be hard to enforce, the House Federal and State Affairs Committee on Tuesday endorsed a bill that would make it illegal for minors to buy chewing tobacco or snuff.

"I realize enforcement would be next to impossible," said Rep. Wanda Fuller, R-Wichita. "But I think it's important we do this because it's consistent with current law that says minors can't buy cigarettes. It does show a consistency by the Legislature."

The bill would make it a misdemeanor for people under 18 years of age to buy any tobacco products — such as cigarettes or smokeless tobacco.

Under an amendment approved by the committee, the penalty for violators would include a $10-$500 fine and 10 days to six months in jail.

The bill did meet some opposition from Rep. Alfred Ramirez, R-Bonner Springs, who said the Legislature was trying to solve problems with meaningless legislation.

However, Rep. Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington and chairman of the panel, reminded his colleagues of testimony by the bill's sponsor, Rep. Elizabeth Baker, R-Derby.

"If you remember, Rep. Baker said a woman in her district said her son thought chewing tobacco must be all right because it wasn't against the law like cigarettes."

The bill passed on a voice vote, however, it was not unanimous.

The committee also heard testimony from the Kansas State Historical Society and the Sedgwick County Commission on a proposal to allow counties to dispose of county government records sooner than currently permitted.

Bonner lifts 'Cats to win over ISU

What a difference three days can make.

The inside shots fell much easier, the man-to-man and zone presses worked more effectively, and Angie Bonner canned 20 points. It all helped the Lady 'Cats basketball squad rebound from Saturday's loss to the University of Kansas to defeat Iowa State University, 73-58, at Ahearn Field House Tuesday night.

The win improves K-State's overall record to 14-4 and its Big Eight record to 4-1. The Cyclones fall to 3-15 overall and 0-5 in the conference.

It was a much-improved K-State performance against the Cyclones, who lost only 55-53 to the same KU team that defeated the Lady 'Cats by 13 points at Allen Field House in Lawrence.

There's the improved K-State field goal shooting — 49 percent against Iowa State as compared with a season-low 32 percent against the Lady Jayhawks — and a much-improved defensive effort that had allowed KU sophomore Vickie Adkins to net 29 points Saturday.

"Our press was much, much better," said Head Coach Lynn Hickey, who threw both man-to-man and zone pressure against the Cyclones.

Sophomore Cassandra Jones' inside bucket gave the Lady 'Cats the opening lead, which they never relinquished. With the help of Jones and Bonner, K-State increased its lead to as much as 17 points in the first half, with Jones scoring 11 and Bonner adding 10. The Lady 'Cats held a commanding 37-22 intermission lead.

Bonner continued her shooting show in the second half, taking assists by freshman Carlisa Thomas and sophomore Sheronda Jenkins and grabbing two offensive rebounds to score eight of K-State's first 10 second-half points.

"Now that's the Angie Bonner I remember," Hickey said of the 6-foot-1 junior. "She was moving a lot, being more active, and she really crashed the boards."

Utilizing Thomas underneath, Jenkins from the outside and the play of freshmen reserves Cindy Durham and Sue Leiding, K-State opened up a 24-point lead with 11:54 remaining. Leiding connected on two consecutive short buckets as the 'Cats took a 58-34 advantage.

Iowa State hit three short jumpers and three baskets underneath, however, to pull within 62-50 at the 5:49 mark. The Cyclones outscored the Lady 'Cats 12-2 during a five-minute span.

Jenkins muffed any hopes of a Cyclone comeback bid with two steals and three consecutive layups in the game's closing moments. Two free throws by Bonner sealed the Lady 'Cats' 73-58 victory.

Bonner, whose 20 points led all scorers, connected on seven field goals out of 10 attempts and six of eight charity tosses. Jenkins added 13 points and Jones netted 12 to round out the K-State attack.

Taylor records win

Four members of the K-State Racquetball Club took home awards from the Mid-America Racquetball Classic, held Friday through Sunday at the Young Men's Christian Association in Salina.

Josie Taylor, president of the club, took first in women's B; Bob Salem grabbed second in men's B; Glen Caby placed third in men's A and Cathy Bachofer placed third in women's C.

"The award for the most phenomenal effort has to go to Jeff Charpentier and Mark McMahan, who played in the men's open doubles as well as singles," Taylor said. "By Saturday night they were exhausted, their knees were bleeding from diving for balls and their legs were dotted with large purple and black bruises. But they never gave up."

The Charpentier-McMahan team was defeated in the semifinals.

There were 150 participants in the tournament. They played in the various divisions of men's singles A, B, and C; women's singles B and C; open doubles; and mixed doubles.

The nine members of the club plan on participating in a tournament to be held this weekend at the Olympiad in Wichita.

Royals' Brett enjoys visit to children's hospital

By The Associated Press

SEATTLE — George Brett of the Kansas City Royals bent over and traded baseball lore with the bedridden boy, who had been struck by a truck.

"You know, I've been in the hospital a bunch of times," Brett, 30, said to 10-year-old Billy Shirley, whose left leg hung by a sling above the bed.

"Were you hit by a baseball?" the child asked.

"No, but everything else has happened, and I get bored just like you and..." said Brett, who was confiding to Billy in whispers now during an hour-long visit by the third baseman to Children's Orthopedic Hospital.

Jeff rolled his bed to a nearby jukebox and punched in "Flashdance." Brett picked up the back of the bed and started dancing.

Brett was in town promoting vitamins at the Show Me How Fair and was escorted through the hospital's "teen" and rehabilitation units by representatives of the company sponsoring the fair.

"I really like to do this kind of thing during the season," Brett said. "A lot of times I go 0-for-4 and think I have a problem, then you see these kids."

A thin 11-year-old girl named Angie challenged him to a football game. She took a 6-2 lead, leaving Brett baffled at his poor showing.

"Angie's not sick, she's not sick," he said in mock protest. "If she is, how come she doesn't spend more time in her room. Angie, I'm going to tell your doctor."

Twelve-year-old Mark walked up, pulling his intravenous hookup like someone else his size might pull a wagon. He challenged Brett to another football game, only this time the major leaguer buckled down and won.

"Come over here," Brett told Mark, leaning over to autograph a photo. Mark draped his stick arm around the big shoulders.

Madison contemplates offer from Washington Federals

Dupree drops out of college

By KATHY WOODWORTH
Collegian Reporter

Opportunity knocked for L.E. Madison, senior in physical education and a starting outside linebacker for the Wildcat football team last fall, who was drafted by the Washington Federals of the United States Football League.

Madison's football career goes back to seventh grade at Manhattan Middle School. He played three years during junior high, followed by three more at Manhattan High School as a defensive tackle and an offensive guard.

Following graduation from Manhattan High School in 1980, Madison was recruited by Butler Community College and Dodge City Community College, but he rejected both offers and decide to walk on at K-State.

"I didn't want to go off to college and run into money problems," said

Madison, who played the outside and middle linebacker positions during his four years at K-State.

Madison's 6-foot-1, 220-pound frame now could take him to professional football.

The actual drafting took place over the telephone. "I don't have a phone, so they couldn't call me personally," Joan Friedrich, secretary at the football stadium, received the call, (then) she informed by mom, and then my mom got hold of me," Madison said. "It was a great feeling inside."

Madison said he was even more excited when he heard he was drafted in the 11th of the 20 drafting rounds.

However, Madison hasn't signed yet because he said he isn't pleased with the money offered in the contract.

"My agent, Dr. Ping from Michigan, is advising me not to go (report to training camp) until they increase my signing bonus," he said.

The Federals originally offered Madison a $1,500 signing bonus and have since raised it to $1,700. Madison said he would like the bonus to be between $5,000 and $7,000.

Madison wouldn't reveal the amount the Federals offered him in his yearly contract, but said he would accept $42,000 per year.

Madison said that by holding out on the contract, it will help his chances of making the team.

"It would be a lot easier for them to cut someone from the team if they had only given the $1,700 as a signing bonus than it would be to cut someone whom they had given $7,000," he said.

If Madison decides to go, he said his immediate plans would be to pack and hope that he's mentally and physically ready.

"I don't want to be a millionaire," he said. "I just want to be comfortable."

By The Associated Press

JACKSON, Miss. — Talented running back Marcus Dupree, barred by the NCAA from playing football until 1985, has dropped out of college for the second time this year, this time from the University of Southern Mississippi.

"He is dropping out for financial, personal reasons," Kenneth Fairley, a Hattiesburg businessman and longtime friend of the one-time University of Oklahoma star, said Tuesday. "He wants to get a job for this semester and try to work out these personal problems."

Fairly said Dupree had not contacted professional teams before making his decision, and spokesmen for both major pro leagues said they were unaware of any plans by Dupree to turn pro.

"He's not eligible for the draft and won't be until a year after his class graduates (1987)," said Jim Hefferman, National Football League director of public relations. "We have our rules, and we have no plans to change them."

Doug Kelly, coordinator of information for the United States Football League, which signed Herschel Walker last year after his junior year at Georgia, said "any statements or questions regarding his future would be purely speculative on anyone's part."

"Marcus has had difficulty coping with the fact he cannot play college football until 1985 and has talked of the possibility of playing professional football," Southern Mississippi Coach Jim Carmody said in a statement.

But Fairley said he had talked with Dupree and that the decision to leave Southern Mississippi had nothing to do with any plans to play in the professional ranks.

Fairley said Dupree was "considering many possibilities, including looking into the NCAA ruling from a possible legal standpoint."

Wildcats to tangle with Iowa State

The K-State men's basketball team will hook up against the Iowa State University Cyclones at 8:10 p.m. today in Ahearn Field House as it tries to capture that elusive first Big Eight Conference victory.

The Cyclones boast the conference's second-leading scorer in forward Barry Stevens. The 6-foot-5 junior is averaging 23.5 points per game. Iowa State guard Terrence Allen, a 6-foot-0 senior, leads the conference with a 62 percent field goal percentage.

Iowa State enters the game after having an eight-day rest. The Cyclones' last game was Jan. 24 at Missouri where they lost on a last-second shot. They have an overall record of 12-5 to go along with a 2-2 conference record.

The Wildcats will be trying to bounce back from a 65-54 loss at the hands of the University of Kansas. This is the first of two consecutive home games for K-State.

"We've got to play well in these two home games," said K-State Head Coach Jack Hartman, "and get in the win column."

Presidential contenders debate issues

By The Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Walter F. Mondale favors swift withdrawal of American Marines from Lebanon, but Sen. John Glenn shies away from setting a date.

Sen. Alan Cranston makes the nuclear freeze the centerpiece of his presidential campaign, giving it an emphasis that the other Democratic presidential contenders have not.

All seven — Mondale, Glenn, Cranston, Sens. Gary Hart and Ernest Hollings, former Sen. George McGovern and Jesse Jackson — had an opportunity Tuesday night to air their foreign policy differences, as well as stress their disagreements with President Reagan.

Former Florida Gov. Reubin Askew was the only major Democratic candidate to skip the debate, sponsored by Harvard's Kennedy School of Government and the Boston Globe.

The forum, one in a long series of face-to-face campaign confrontations, was arranged at a time when the pace of the campaign is quickening, with the lead-off Iowa caucuses less than three weeks away and the New Hampshire primary set for eight days later on Feb. 28.

Massachusetts holds its Democratic primary March 13, the "Super Tuesday" on which several Southern states hold primary elections as well.

Whatever the disagreements among themselves, all seven Democrats participating in the debate have long been critical of Reagan's Lebanon policy, and have opposed the administration's policy of providing covert assistance to guerillas fighting the leftist government in Nicaragua.

On arms control, all Democrats complain that Reagan has failed to achieve any progress in negotiations with the Russians, an issue that is expected to become a major issue in the fall campaign, regardless of who wins the Democratic nomination.

Reagan, who announced Sunday that he will seek a second term, counters that the world is safer than it was before he was inaugurated because of his administration's military buildup.

Reagan said he understands that some people fear that war is closer, but said that is an incorrect perception.

Reagan's pollster, Richard Wirthlin, disclosed earlier in the day that private polls indicate that 25 percent to 28 percent of the public fear that Reagan would be likely to get the country into an unnecessary war.

State reports higher tax revenues

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — State tax collections in January exceeded projections by $12 million or nearly 9 percent, providing Kansas revenue officials with more hope that no budget problems will develop later this year.

Secretary of Revenue Harley Duncan said Tuesday that January collections were $148.1 million or about $12.1 million above estimates made by a group of fiscal experts.

Through the first seven months of the fiscal year, July through January, revenues are up $16.8 million or 2.1 percent above estimates.

It is vital that tax collections nearly mirror or exceed the projections because a drastic shortfall could force lawmakers this session to cut spending or find more revenue through higher taxes.

"Based on the evidence, I feel pretty comfortable with the year-long estimates we have," said Duncan. "They're right there in the ballpark."

The state is expected to have a $72 million balance in its general fund bank account at the end of the fiscal year in June if revenues meet collections and spending does not exceed appropriations made last year.

In January, revenues exceeded estimates for all of the three major taxes. Corporate income receipts were up $4.8 million, individual income taxes collections were up $2.6 million, and the sales tax increased $2.1 million.

Severance tax collections in January exceeded projections by $1.5 million. However, Duncan said receipts from the minerals production tax might shrink in the next two months because recent cold weather has reduced oil production.

In addition, Duncan cautioned that corporate and individual income tax collections in the coming month may drop depending upon "refund patterns."

"We know that we'll have to pay a corporate refund of $2 to $4 million," said Duncan.

Much of January's increase in corporate tax receipts was the result of usually large payments from some companies because a Department of Revenue audit determined they previously had underpaid.

Still, Duncan said corporate collections, which are about $9.5 million above year-to-date projections, are an encouraging sign.

"We're seeing some improvement in the economy," said Duncan.

Experts want more tests on dioxin's effects

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A study of dioxin's effects on people exposed to the toxic chemical in Missouri has raised questions about whether it affects their immunity to disease. But medical experts say the study is not statistically significant.

The report from the federal Centers for Disease Control and the Missouri Division of Health called for further study.

"The pilot study has raised questions concerning whether (dioxin) at these exposure levels affects human cellular immunity," stated the final report, released late Monday. "Further studies will be necessary before any definitive statements can be made," the report said.

Dr. Henry Falk of the CDC in Atlanta said the study was designed only to give scientists a quick way of spotting possible health effects of the chemical.

The report gives more detail on an initial set of results first announced in October, but does not alter the earlier findings that "overall, there are no conclusive findings of abnormality," Falk said.

City commissioners discuss plans to improve sidewalks

The City Commission discussed snow removal and more sidewalks while reviewing the capital improvement schedule for 1985 to 1989 at a work session Tuesday afternoon at City Hall.

City officials voiced some of the concerns they heard at a public hearing conducted last Thursday.

Mayor Wanda Fateley said a major concern among citizens is more sidewalks. Director of Finance Bernie Hayen said the city has $4.5 million in sidewalk improvements in the capital improvements plan, and the problem is slowly being remedied.

Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood said the areas around schools should have first priority.

Sidewalks in Cico Park and the surrounding area also are a concern, she said.

Snow removal was another item of discussion. City Manager Don Harmon said some citizens would prefer having the snow scooped to the middle of the street instead of off to the side, which causes snow to be piled on sidewalks already cleaned by residents.

Size of streets poses a snow removal problem, Harmon said. Piling snow in the middle of many small, two-lane streets would have disrupted traffic.

Commissioner Dave Fiser said the city should consider adopting a policy to protect park lawns.

Fugitive from U.S. leads black supremacy sect in Guyana

By The Associated Press

GEORGETOWN, Guyana — David Hill, a fugitive from U.S. justice, used to picket white businesses in Cleveland's black ghetto. Today, he calls himself Rabbi Washington and lives in luxury in this impoverished land as king of the House of Israel, a black supremacy sect with 8,000 followers.

The short, rotund, self-styled black rabbi rides through the tree-lined streets of this tropical South American capital in big American cars, armed guards beside him and an automatic pistol in his pocket.

He preaches each afternoon on the government-owned radio station that Jesus was black and a Jew and that black men will inherit the earth.

His members work for the House of Israel, either on a 17,300-acre farm in the jungle not far from where Jim Jones and more than 900 members of his People's Temple died in a mass suicide Nov. 18, 1978, or in factories which produce African-style clothing and Rabbi Salted Peanuts and Rabbi (banana) Chips.

The 35-year-old Washington is a militant supporter of socialist President Forbes Burnham. Some say Washington's 800-man Royal Cadet Corps is as well trained and armed as the national defense forces.

Human rights activists and other religious leaders blame Rabbi Washington for much of the country's political violence.

"People are afraid of him," said Rev. Andrew Morrison, a Jesuit priest and editor of the Catholic Standard, the only privately owned newspaper in Guyana. A member of Washington's congregation was convicted in 1980 of attacking and killing the paper's photographer as he took pictures of House of Israel demonstrators protesting an inquiry into the assassination of an opposition politician. The inquiry was never completed.

In a recent interview, Washington denied he was a henchman for Burnham, who for 19 years has ruled this Idaho-sized country of 800,000 people on the northeast shoulder of South America.

"I have read that I'm his hit man, that we carry out his bustin' up of opposition political meetings. All of that is just baloney...I hope the president is not my enemy. I hope he is my friend."

But Burnham said in a separate interview that he had never formally met Washington, although he had seen him on the street.

"He drives some big Yankee car," the president said. "We do not allow him to be armed. If we thought he were armed, we would know what to do because it is an offense under the law."

When Burnham protested the U.S.-led invasion of Grenada in October, Washington and several hundred of his congregation surrounded the U.S. Embassy and held an all-night vigil.

When the cane field workers went on strike, Washington sent 350 of his faithful to save the sugar harvest. House of Israel workers manned cash registers and waited on customers during a strike in the government's department stores.

Washington said he came to Guyana in 1972, after stops in Algeria, Haiti and Cuba, to escape serving prison sentences in Ohio. Cleveland court records show Washington had been convicted of nine counts of blackmail in connection with a boycott which forced several white-managed McDonald's fast food franchises in Cleveland to be sold to blacks.

In Guyana, Washington has a private home beside the Caribbean, a rambling, well-furnished, single-story house with a swimming pool. Hand-written labels are tacked to two lounge chairs in the dining room. One says "the king," the other "the queen." Washington refers to his Guyanese wife and three children as the royal family.

His aides are called princes. When they enter his study, they salute with a clenched fist and address him as "your highness."

"I am the king. They refer to me as the king of Israel," he said.

"Everybody that's wantin' is gettin' now, and that's my religion," he said. "I don't believe in no milk and honey in heaven...I want now. I want land. I want it now. I'm trying to get some more. I want milk and honey. So I buy cows, we get some milk and we get beehives and we get some honey, right now, here on this Earth."

He said his ultimate goal was to leave the House of Israel's 47 synagogues behind and move to the farm.

"I have a community bigger than his (Jim Jones)," he said. "Jim Jones only became a devil after he was dead. When Jim Jones was alive he was almost a messiah."

Jim Jones was a member of the Guyana Council of Churches, which has damned Rabbi Washington. After Jim Jones was exposed, they wanted to transfer their guilt from the Christian religion and who could they find to saddle the blame on? Rabbi Washington. (They say) the House of Israel is the next Jim Jones."

Washington said there was a great deal of pressure on Burnham to get him out of the country.

"Here I am in South America where the churches, the unions and all the opposition parties either would like for me to be dead or turned over to the FBI in the morning," he said.

"Governments have tendencies of changing their minds. Politics is the science of deals. They'd give a good deal to get Rabbi Washington out of this country," Washington said.

"Be it true or false, most people in this country believe that next to the Guyana Defense Forces, Rabbi Washington and his forces are the most equipped, the most military trained and the most prepared to fight."

Abuse shelter representatives lobby for funds

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Representatives of battered women's shelters in Lawrence and Topeka Tuesday urged lawmakers to provide "a stable, renewable source of funding" for domestic violence programs.

"Funding is very, very tight," said Elizabeth Taylor, a representative of the Kansas Association of Domestic Violence Programs.

Taylor told the Senate Judiciary Committee the 18 shelter programs she represented receive money from the United Way, revenue-sharing funds, community development block grants, and private donations.

She endorsed a proposal by Sen. Wint Winter Jr., R-Lawrence, to make state money available for domestic violence programs by increasing marriage license fees to $25 from $17.

Winter said he is still working on the draft of his proposal.

Barb Smith of Women's Transitional Care Services in Lawrence said private foundations would be more willing to make donations to domestic violence shelters if the state provided a stable source of funds to maintain existing programs.

Contributions from private foundations to the Lawrence shelter decreased in 1983, Smith said, adding that the total budget for the shelter dropped to $44,000 in 1983 from $84,000 in 1982.

However, the number of women and children served by the shelter had increased to 359 in 1983 from 238 in 1982, Smith said.

Rep. Joan Waggon, D-Topeka, and executive director of the Topeka YWCA, said the shelter in Topeka which serves the victims of domestic violence is supported totally by local funds.

"Thirty-seven percent of the women we serve go back to the abusive situation," she said. "But they go back for valid, logical reasons."

"Sometimes the person who abused you is also someone you shared good moments with or is the father of your children."

But Sen. Frank Gaines,

D-Augusta, said the women who had testified should look to the state Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, not the Legislature, for funds.

"It's not a matter of coming to the Legislature saying bucks will take care of the problem," he said. "If that's going to be a proper function of government, pressure should be put on SRS."

Gaines said he reviewed Gov. John Carlin's recommendations for the SRS budget and found dramatic increases in the funds proposed for such programs.

But Aileen Whitfill, executive assistant to the SRS Secretary Robert Harder, disputed Gaines's findings.

Fumes force evacuation at center for handicapped

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — Insecticide fumes Tuesday forced the evacuation of about 200 people at a training center for the handicapped near downtown Wichita, authorities said.

Battalion Chief Tom Ladage of the Wichita Fire Department said a person working in The New Leaf, a greenhouse attached to the east side of the Kansas Elks Training Center, set off an eight-ounce canister of insecticide to fumigate the greenhouse about 11:30 a.m.

Ladage said safety precautions weren't followed and fumes from the aerosol were spread throughout the center's main building by its heating and cooling system. He said the staff members and handicapped clients evacuated from the building were all examined at the scene.

Firefighters and the Sedgwick County Hazardous Materials Response Team ventilated the training center building. A center spokesman said the building wouldn't be used until at least 12:30 p.m. today.

Conservative student newspapers struggle to obtain more credibility

By The College Press Service

All that happened to the conservative Davis Dossier during its first year of newspaper life was that a homosexual student politician threatened to sue, administrators barred it from University of California-Davis dorms, and one of its advertisers publicly apologized for buying space in it.

Then some of the paper's other advertisers dropped out.

And then it got into a name-calling contest with the California Aggie, the school's major newspaper.

The Dossier survived anyway. Editor Mike Hart thinks the future for his paper looks good. The next issue is about to appear.

His experiences aren't atypical of the 34 avowedly conservative student papers that have sprung up on the nation's campuses over the last three years.

They're surviving, though to do so, some are toning down their stridency and even accepting the help of unconservative groups like the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU).

But survival itself is no mean trick when the fatality rate for publications is so high, when the student press in particular is in a depression, when many administrators have been openly hostile toward the papers, and when many of the papers themselves try to attract attention by effecting a cultured disdain for non-conservative and certain not-very-powerful American groups.

Some papers even are thriving, largely because of off-campus subscriptions and the support of foundations and wealthy friends like Charlton Heston and President Reagan's brother.

The Dartmouth Review, a pioneer of the new wave, is growing "at an exponential rate," former Editor Mike Collette said. Off-campus paid circulation rose by 40 percent — or 3,000 people — in the last year.

"Most of the papers support themselves now," said John Carson, founder of Student Magazine in Colorado and of Students for a Better America, a conservative student group.

Only one of the 34 papers has failed, said Bill Jensen, grants director of the Institute for Educational Affairs (IEA) in New York.

The IEA, a conservative think tank founded by former Treasury Secretary William Simon and writer Irving Kristol, has given money to most of the papers to help launch them.

This year alone, the IEA has contributed some $350,000 to 24 papers "that are without exception intellectually conservative," Jensen said.

"The money is a seed grant," he said. "We're not funding ongoing operations. In fact, most of our concern with our applicants is with determining whether they can complete the projects they're undertaking, if they've made the editorial and production fund raising plans they'll be needing."

Sometimes they've needed other kinds of help. Two weeks ago the ACLU began representing the HawkEye Review in its crusade to distribute in the University of Iowa's dorms. The ACLU has also represented the Dartmouth paper in legal scrapes.

"The question is freedom of the press," Dwayne Rohovit of the Iowa ACLU said.

Conservative papers at Northwestern and Columbia also have had trouble distributing on their campuses.

Administrators usually fight them because they're angry over the papers' deliberately provocative styles, though one teacher is suing the Dartmouth paper for libel.

Dartmouth officials have reprimanded the Review twice for supposed racism and sexism. One editorial about affirmative action, titled "Dis Sho' Ain't No Jive, Bro," was written in a jive dialect. Womens' Studies courses almost always are called "Lesbo Studies" in the paper.

The University of California-San Diego's student government dropped funding of the conservative California Review in the wake of a Review article many students construed "to be in favor of rape," recalls Christopher Canola, then a Review staffer who now writes for the Daily Guardian on campus.

Review Editor Eric Young dismissed the readers' anger by claiming the woman who led the effort to withdraw funding "was so far into feminism and is a bona fide homosexual, so her credibility is nothing."

But such scrapes have led some editors to consider a retreat from provocation.

Student to provide tax assistance

By TERESA CAWTHON
Collegian Reporter

Free income tax assistance is returning to the K-State Union.

Elias Saig, graduate in adult education, will be available to assist individuals with their tax forms beginning Feb. 6.

Saig has been trained by the Internal Revenue Service as a Volunteer Income Tax Assistant (VITA). VITAs must attend a tax course and pass a test each year before they are certified.

This is the fourth year Saig has been a VITA and the second year he has offered this service in the Union.

"Even though we're operating this service in the Student Government Association (SGA) office in the Union, we are available to serve the general public," Saig said. "Our hours will be from 2 to 4 p.m. on Mondays and Thursdays. Since April 15 falls on a Sunday, our last day of operation will be Monday, April 16."

This year Saig will be assisted by members of Beta Alpha Psi, the accounting honorary.

The Beta Alpha Psi members are recognized by the IRS based on accounting courses they have completed.

With help from the honor society this year, Saig said he hopes to eliminate some of the congestion experienced last year. No appointments are necessary; all persons are served on a first come, first served basis.

"For the best results, bring last year's tax forms and any documents you have relating to your income," Saig said. "This will help us and assure that we are correct. If you just want to find out what forms you need and get guidance for completing those forms, we can do that, too."

The state director of VITA receives weekly report forms from the IRS on forms completed by VITAs. The report indicates whether there have been any errors on the forms and how to avoid those errors on future forms.

Last year the IRS reported that 200 forms were completed by Saig at the Union and none had errors. Other colleges and universities in Kansas which offered the VITA service did not have as large a volume as K-State.

Because of the success experienced by Saig at K-State, his system of handling forms is being used as a model at other Kansas universities this year. Saig said he thinks the primary reason for the good reception of the service at K-State is its location in the Union.

"If we have a questions about a form, we can call the IRS office in Wichita. If their number is busy, we can call any of the other state offices for an answer," Saig said. "Also, on the forms we complete, we can send them to the Wichita office to be checked before sending them to the regional office in Texas."

The VITAs keep no copies of documents brought to them or of completed tax forms.

"The individual should be sure to keep a copy though," Saig said. "That copy is important in case there are questions on this year's taxes and for preparing next year's forms."

Saig emphasized that the VITA service is open to the general public and is not limited to K-State students because of its location in the SGA office.

President ignores resolution for swift troop withdrawal

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — House Democrats gave overwhelming support Wednesday to a resolution calling for prompt withdrawal of U.S. Marines from Lebanon, but President Reagan said he would not pay any attention to their demands.

No vote was taken in the closed meeting of the Democratic majority in the House, but Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., said, "Everybody was pretty much in agreement."

House Majority Whip Thomas S. Foley, D-Wash., said no date was set for floor action, but it could come before Feb. 10, when Congress takes an 11-day recess.

O'Neill told reporters, "There is no excuse for the president. Somewhere, they have messed up. The Marines...were over there for diplomatic purposes and now they are over there huddled down defending themselves."

"I think we all unanimously agree with the fact that the president has failed in his policy."

Reagan, posing for photographs with Yugoslav President Mika Spiljak, was asked to comment on the resolution and replied, "It's too happy an occasion to talk about anything the Democrats are doing."

When reporters pressed him for his views, Reagan said, "I'm not going to pay any attention to it."

Asked to comment on the president's remark, O'Neill said: "The onus is on the president of the United States. We tried to build a bipartisan policy, but when it fails we have a responsibility to speak out against it. We would be derelict if we did not."

The speaker said he telephoned Rep. Dante Fascell, D-Fla., chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and told him that the leadership would like to have the resolution on the floor next week if possible. The committee began consideration of the measure Wednesday afternoon.

Earlier, presidential spokesman Larry Speakes accused the Democrats of "playing politics" with the issue and urged them to "close ranks" behind Reagan. He said the president will keep the Marines in the multinational Lebanese peacekeeping force as long as necessary.

O'Neill, asked to comment on Speakes' remarks, said, "We are trying to keep this as nonpolitical as we possibly can."

"We are saying to the president of the United States, 'Mr. President...the safety of the Marines is at stake. Get them out of there.'"

The Democratic resolution calls for "prompt and orderly withdrawal" of the American forces, without setting a date.

O'Neill said he is against setting a date. Foley said Democrats in the meeting argued for a date, saying it would strengthen the resolution. But he said most of these Democrats apparently would support the measure as it stands, especially if it is brought to a vote quickly.

The resolution, which would not carry the force of law, calls for Reagan to report to Congress within 30 days on what steps he has taken to accomplish the withdrawal.

Reagan sends budget to Congress; deficit draws Democratic challenge

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The $925.5 billion budget President Reagan sent to Congress on Wednesday mirrors his goals for the nation: to increase its military strength and to do it without the pain of raising taxes. But the plan is burdened with a projected $180.4 billion deficit.

It recognizes the reality that in an election year Congress would oppose cuts in domestic spending.

Absent from Reagan's package for the 1985 fiscal year that begins Oct. 1 is any comprehensive blueprint for significantly cutting the deficits within the next several years.

That is being left for bipartisan negotiations among members of Congress and White House officials. Reagan hopes those talks, expected to begin next week, will lead to a three-year, $100 billion "down payment" on the deficits.

But Democrats — sensing the big dose of red ink in Reagan's budget may be a potent campaign issue — said they would raise the ante and call what they claim is an election-year bluff by the president.

"We'll call you and raise you and we'll be prepared to make some really big reductions in the deficit," said House Majority Leader Jim Wright, D-Texas.

He said Democrats now are looking at finding $200 billion in reductions. Much of that likely would come from tax increases and military spending cuts Reagan has ruled out.

At a news conference on the budget, key administration officials repeatedly made a pitch for Congress to begin work on the "down payment."

Budget Director David Stockman said the administration assumes measures will be taken in 1985 and 1986 to substantially reduce the deficits.

"It is not our intent that deficits of this magnitude of $180 billion in 1987 should actually unfold," he said.

Without deficit-paring actions, he said, the red ink could swell to more than $200 billion in 1985 and 1986. "That's what we're trying to avoid," he said.

On Capitol Hill, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., sharply criticized the budget, complaining of its "ridiculous spending" on the military and the enormous deficits.

In a message included with the budget, the president said the nation's economic health is proof that his fiscal program over the past three years has been the right medicine.

In all, Reagan is asking for 1985 defense outlays of $264.4 billion, a

Legislators dispute limits for small claims suits, drug costs

By MIKE TURNER
Government Editor

A bill which would raise the ceiling for small claims suits from $500 to $1,000 and another which would limit the costs drug manufacturers could charge in Kansas were debated during hearings Tuesday by the Kansas House Ways and Means Committee.

Rep. Dennis Spaniol, R-Wichita, sponsored the first bill. He said an increasing number of damages, which would be taken to small claims court, are over the $500 limit established by current legislation.

"It is becoming increasingly difficult for the average citizen to gain access to our legal system," Spaniol said.

He said students have a relatively large proportion of cases which may be affected by the proposal because of landlord-tenant problems.

Testimony in opposition to the proposal centered around an expected increase in administrative problems.

Joyce Reeves, clerk of the Shawnee County District Court, said there are more than 1,000 small claims cases heard each year in Shawnee County.

Reeves said the current caseload is very time-consuming for the judge and the court clerk. She said she expects the number of cases to increase dramatically if the proposal is adopted.

She also said someone could be sued for $1,000 and not have the right to counsel because current policy does not permit attorneys to handle small claims cases.

Reeves said there would be many more appeals with the $1,000 ceiling unless the Legislature decides to permit counsel in small claims court.

Candidates to debate in Union

Candidates for student body president will face questions at noon today in the Union Catskeller in a forum sponsored by the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee.

Jerry Katlin, current student body president and senior in public administration, will pose a question to candidates and each will be given equal time to respond.

Candidates for student body president include Dana Hawkins, senior in radio and television; Ken Heinz, junior in computer science; Eddie Rodriguez, sophomore in pre-law and Tracy Turner, junior in economics.

Bombers replace Titans at air base

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — McConnell Air Force Base was selected as home of a B-1 bomber wing Wednesday. Local leaders were relieved because they feared a $98 million loss to their economy after the base's Titan 2 missiles were dismantled.

The 17 Titan missiles surrounding McConnell will be retired beginning in July. The wing of 16 new B-1 bombers was to be deployed in 1988, U.S. Sen. Robert Dole, R-Kan., said. Wichita Mayor Margalee Wright said the new mission would be "a significant shot in the arm for the economy in this region."

The city stood to lose 1,190 military and civilian jobs with a payroll of about $19.5 million once the Titans were dismantled. Unemployment was expected to increase 1 percent.

Dole estimated the potential direct and indirect loss to the area economy was $98 million.

"It just appeared to us to be a natural," said Richard D. Smith, chairman of the Wichita Area Chamber of Commerce, after listening to the announcement from Washington on the telephone.

"We already have two 13,000-foot runways out there," Smith said. "We're an interior station. We have good weather here. And we already have the largest Air Guard outfit in the country. It looked to us like we should be the one to get it."

Jerry Mallot, a chamber staffer, said initially it was thought McConnell would get only one squadron of eight B-1's. He said the assignment of an entire wing was unexpected good news.

The B-1 program still faces criticism in Congress. Dole and Senator Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan., said Kassebaum has been a critic in the past.

Kassebaum, who said she had voted against the bomber at least 20 times, said she would drop her opposition now.

"I am pleased that as long as we are having the B-1s, that some will be stationed at McConnell," said

Kassebaum, chairman of the Senate's Military Reform Caucus, a group that seeks efficiency in defense spending.

Congressman Dan Glickman, D-Kan., said McConnell will also get six more F-4 fighter planes this summer for its Kansas Air National Guard wing and the 73 additional support workers.

Dole said the new B-1s will be deployed at a rate of three a month from February through June of 1988. Deployment will be preceded by $75 million in improvements in runways and other facilities at the base.

The investment of $75 million — as well as another $40 million already earmarked for McConnell — assures the base will have a future even if the B-1 program is axed.

Dole said 13 KC-135 tanker aircraft will be deployed to the McConnell refueling wing in July for a three-year assignment as a "fill-in" measure to help stem economic harm between removal of the Titan missiles and deployment of the B-1 bombers.

NASA begins countdown for shuttle's next mission

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — The National Aeronautics and Space Administration began the countdown for the 10th shuttle mission early Wednesday. Two astronauts made dozens of jet plane passes at a three-mile concrete runway in practice for the first Florida landing.

Commander Vance Brand and pilot Robert Gibson were in the air at dawn, just hours after the clock started ticking toward liftoff at 8 a.m. EST Friday of a flight that will feature man's first spacewalk without a lifeline.

After eight days in orbit, Brand and Gibson are to steer the shuttle Challenger to a touchdown on a strip just four miles from the launch pad. Both had the landing on their minds when they talked with reporters Tuesday.

"We're hoping the weather will cooperate and we'll have the honor of being the first to land back here," Brand said.

"We'd like to land back here, but you're going to have to generate some nice weather for us to get back," Gibson said.

Rain and clouds derailed the only previous attempt to land a shuttle at Cape Canaveral. That was on the seventh flight, last July, when the touchdown was diverted to Edwards Air Force Base, Calif., site of eight of the nine shuttle landings. The other returned to White Sands, N.M., because of bad weather at Edwards.

NASA hopes launch-site landings will become routine. That would eliminate the need to ferry the shuttle to Florida from

Card game attracts club members

A variation of a card game is helping the K-State student chapter of the National Agri-Marketing Association boost interest and membership, according to John Riley, professor economics and the group's adviser. At each NAMA meeting or when new members are brought in, students are permitted to draw one regular playing card. Then, at the end of the semester, the student who can form the best poker hand wins a prize. One NAMA project this semester that will give a student member an extra card is Mentor Day, when students spend one day on the job with members of their parent professional NAMA chapter in Kansas City. The K-State chapter will host the national NAMA convention, March 31 through April 1 in Kansas City. It will compete with 20 other chapters in a marketing presentation, which the K-State chapter won last year.

Class helps students lose pounds, gain awareness of eating behavior

Besides starving at meal time or going without dessert, there is an alternative method at K-State for losing weight.

Martha Ann Olson, R.D. (registered dietitian), head of the dietary department at Lafene Student Health Center, conducts a weekly weight reduction class for students who wish to shed excess pounds.

"The goal of the classes is to instruct students on the fundamentals of good nutrition, to recognize what eating behaviors need to be changed and to set goals for losing weight," Olson said.

Students attend the classes on a voluntary basis. At each meeting, they weigh in and submit a food record of everything they have eaten for the past week, Olson said.

"The food record increases the awareness of their eating behaviors," she said.

Instead of counting calories, the students keep track of the amount of food which they've consumed by using the Stucky point system, devised by Virginia Stucky, who received a bachelor of science degree from K-State in 1943.

The Stucky system uses smaller numbers when counting caloric intake.

"It's more encouraging and much easier to think in terms of 16 points instead of 1,200 calories," Olson said.

The last part of the class is spent talking with and encouraging fellow students. A total of 28 students are enrolled in two classes this semester.

"The key to success is learning to eat sensibly. When you're overweight, you're eating too much. The secret is to eat in moderation, but not to deprive your body of its nutritional requirements," Olson said.

A few of the commercial programs available to the public are successful means of weight reduction. However, in most cases, the weight loss is only temporary because the dieter's eating habits have not been modified, she said.

"Ours is a common-sense program that can continue throughout one's lifetime. The results are exciting. Students come in voluntarily and stay motivated. That's quite a feat," Olson said.

The goal is for each student to lose two pounds every week. The record weight reduction occurred in 1978 when 152 students collectively lost a total of 763 pounds, Olson said. Extreme weight loss within a short span of time is discouraged, she said.

Students are encouraged to take advantage of campus facilities such as the Natatorium and L.P. Washburn Recreational Complex. Exercise combined with a reduced caloric intake is the most effective way to lose weight, she said.

The Lafene classes were begun in 1972 by Mike Bradshaw, former health educator at Lafene. When Olson joined the staff in 1974, she took over and has been actively involved since.

Professor lies on nails to drive home a point

By KAREN BELLUS
Staff Writer

Some instructors go to great lengths to get their point across in class. Few, however, will go as far as Larry Kirkpatrick will.

Kirkpatrick, associate professor of physics, will lie on a bed of nails, allow a cement block to be broken by a 16-pound sledgehammer on his chest, dip his finger into liquid nitrogen (which at room temperature is minus 279 degrees Celsius), pull a tablecloth out from under a table setting, fire himself across the room with a rocket and perform other stunts to demonstrate the properties and laws of physics.

Kirkpatrick, who is currently on a one-year sabbatical leave from Montana State University, began teaching in 1969 and said he has always used demonstrations in his classes.

"At that time my physics course wasn't required. I did demonstrations then to build up more interest in the class. A lot of physicists do similar things," he said.

"One of the things I try to do is to make something dramatic in the hope the students will remember the physics principles behind the stunts," he said.

For example, lying on a bed of nails exemplifies the importance of weight distribution. Allowing a cement block to be broken by a sledgehammer while the block is resting on his chest, demonstrates the principle of inertia.

Kirkpatrick said he believes the demonstrations are effective learning tools. The students who have taken classes from him seem to agree with the success of the demonstrations, he said.

Kelly Dubbert, sophomore in business administration, said he remembers the first day of class. Kirkpatrick allowed a colleague within the department to break a cement block on his chest with a sledgehammer while he was lying on a bed of approximately 800 nails.

"It really got people excited. It showed us that if you came to class everyday, you'd see something different each time," he said.

"The demonstrations make it easier to remember (physics principles) during the tests. You can relate back to something other than notes on a piece of paper," Dubbert said.

"I...hope the students will remember the physics principles behind the stunts."

— Larry Kirkpatrick

Kirkpatrick said he had no special training before doing the class demonstrations. However, he said he got several of his ideas from demonstrations by colleagues, meetings with other physicists and professional newsletters.

He also has made television appearances on "To Tell the Truth," the Phil Donahue segment of the "Today" show, a Canadian game show "Claim to Fame" and a public television educational series in Montana.

Appearances on the television shows came about after the physics department of Montana State and its class demonstrations were featured in a local newspaper article. The article was sent over the Associated Press wire. Shortly after that, Kirkpatrick said, calls for radio interviews and television appearances started coming in.

Kirkpatrick has been at K-State since June working with Dean Zollman, professor of physics. At K-State, Kirkpatrick has made demonstrations while teaching the course "The Physical World I."

Cupid's victim will have to shell out up to $100 for a dozen roses for his sweetheart this Valentine's Day, thanks in part to the winter's record cold.

The price of roses often takes a jump at florist shops just before the holiday for lovers, but the increase will be even greater in some cities this year because of higher costs of heating greenhouses.

A random survey of a few of the 30,000 florist shops around the country showed the price of a dozen long-stemmed roses ranged from $36 in Macon, Ga., to $100 in some New York shops.

"Valentine's Day is just wild, just crazy," said Jimmy Tokunaga, a co-owner of Shannon Greenhouses in Columbia, S.C., where roses are selling for $50 to $60 a dozen.

"We think it's ridiculous to charge what we have to charge for roses," said Roger Patton, advertising manager for The Blossom Shop in Columbia, S.C., where roses were going for $50 a dozen.

"I'd rather sell anything but roses," he said.

Parking council takes fair action

The Traffic and Parking Council made a sound decision Monday when it rescinded a parking fee increase and reduced the processing fee for ticket appeals from $5 to $1.

It is heartening to see a University board making common sense judgments. Traffic and parking fines should not be given simply for fund-raising purposes, but to punish those who break laws enacted for the common good. A $5 appeal charge for failed appeals would have been double jeopardy instead of a postage and handling fee. While the intent of the charge — reducing the number of appeals — still is questionable, the council showed good faith in limiting the amount to a reasonable figure.

The council also deserves commendation for making the K-State Police Department do its job by mailing results of appeals. That move, which is expected to save the former "mail carrier," Student Governing Association, $320 a year in postage, is something all students can be happy with. After all, a few hundred here and a few hundred there soon adds up.

Parking fees are always in the spotlight as spaces seem to become scarcer each year. While the amounts of the proposed increases — $5 for faculty and $2 for students — are nominal, the council was wise to recognize its earlier mistake and void the resolution for lack of information.

Most would like to see fees remain the same or drop, but a closer examination of the condition of parking lots should indicate that the status quo cannot be preserved for long.

Should the council subcommittee formed to study the proposals collect more information and find the need for an increase, the plan presented by Vice President for University Facilities Gene Cross makes the most sense. Fee increases should be staggered through 1985. Nobody can predict the state of students' budgets that far in the future. If a 25 percent increase was levied on students and faculty in a lump sum, the results could be almost as disastrous as doing without an increase.

Other campus governing organizations and even the Board of Regents should take a look at reasonable and prudent management in action. Stay the course, council members. If the University has to endure parking increases, at least those buying permits will know the decision was carefully considered.

Glenn losing candidacy support

Someone seems to have been lost in the shuffle.

After garnering a lot of early attention in his bid for the Democratic presidential nomination, Sen. John Glenn now seems to be victimized by the attention being paid some other candidates. He is being ignored.

Last year when the Democratic candidates started lining up and chomping at their bits, former Vice President Walter Mondale and Glenn were the first to merit media attention because of their former achievements and household names. In the beginning, many of the other contenders made names for themselves by announcing their candidacies: Sens. Alan Cranston, Gary Hart and Ernest Hollings, former Sen. George McGovern, the Rev. Jesse Jackson and former Florida governor Reubin Askew.

Newspapers, magazines, television and radio followed the paths of Mondale and Glenn and polls kept close tabs on the popularity of both. Both seemingly basked in the spotlight of national attention.

It wasn't long, however, before both Mondale and Glenn, not to mention five other Democrats in the race, were stunningly upstaged. Over New Year's weekend, Jackson flew to Syria, chatted with President Hafez Assad, and escorted Navy pilot Robert Goodman home to America.

Suddenly all eyes and ears were turned toward Jackson. His dynamic speaking ability, fiery oratory and charismatic personality kept the media's attention after his successful Syrian mission. Many people came to appreciate his viewpoints and support his positions. As a result, Jackson virtually usurped Glenn's second-place spot behind Mondale in the Democratic race. Glenn was demoted to the list of "other runners."

But the entire field of Democratic candidates were overshadowed when President Reagan, soon after his State of the Union address, announced his plans for reelection. The media turned its attention to Reagan as he declared his administration needed four more years to finish the work it had started during the current term.

The introductions are over; the preliminaries have passed. It's time to get down to the nitty-gritty and figure out from among all the hype and rhetoric who the worthwhile candidates are. Upcoming primaries will slowly weed out the losers and pinpoint the final Democratic duels before the party convention later this year.

Glenn has met stiff competition already in just trying to keep his name afloat in the first stage of the race. If he expects to gather any major support, he now will have to work doubly hard to recoup support lost after Jackson achieved sudden stardom. And attracting attention at this point in the game will take a major political play equivalent to Jackson's.

"ON SECOND THOUGHT...."

Good terrorists, bad terrorists

"Hey Slickboy, wake up!" Freaksome said, "You slept right through our assignment!"

Slickboy came awake with a start as the other students filed out of the political science class. "Hey man, what happened?" he asked.

"We have an assignment due tomorrow. See these world maps? We're supposed to look at each country, and every country that is terrorist or that supports terrorism, we paint red. All of the countries that do neither, we leave white."

"That is excellent!" Slickboy said. "That's not too hard. I mean, didn't you see that article in last week's Collegian? It said Reagan had just declared Iran a terrorist nation because it supports international terrorism. Like, they are really messing around over in Lebanon, and they've been blamed for the suicide bombing of the Marines and the French soldiers."

"And like, what about Syria, and look at Libya! I mean, Khaddafi is too tacky for words," Slickboy said. "Not to mention Bulgaria, they were implicated in the shooting attempt on the Pope. (You know, this is kind of fun.) And look at Cuba, they have 20,000 troops in Angola!"

"Hey man, wait a minute," Freaksome said. "Before we go off doing this, we gotta define terrorism, you know?"

(Later that night, American Heritage Dictionary in hand.) "Terrorism," Slickboy read. "1. The use of terror, violence and intimidation to achieve an end. 2. Fear and subjugation produced by this." See man, I mean, that is Iran right there."

"But keep on reading, man," Freaksome said. "It also says, '3. A system of government that uses terror to rule.' That describes a lot of countries."

"Super," Slickboy said, "that means that we get to include Poland, Afghanistan, and really, the Soviet Union!"

"You're right, but I mean 'A system of government that uses terror to rule' could also describe El Salvador, Guatemala, the Philippines, South Africa, Chile and Israel, to name a few."

"But we can't paint them red," Slickboy said. "I mean, we support those countries!"

"Hey man, do you consider overthrowing a democratically elected government and murdering the popular president terrorism?"

"Of course," Slickboy said. "Well that is what the CIA did in Chile. And do you know that after the coup, the military rounded up thousands of young people and put them in the national stadium? The officials then took Victor Jara, a popular protest singer, put him in the middle of the field, cut off his hands and told him, 'now play for us.' Does that qualify as using terror?"

"That's kind of tacky," Slickboy agreed, "but weren't we saving them from communism?"

"That's mild compared to Israel," Freaksome said. "Do you know that as many as 40,000 civilians were killed in the invasion of Lebanon? What was Israel saving them from? It sounds crazy, but after that Israel came back to the United States asking for more aid. Reagan sort of said, you bad boys, I am going to punish you by erasing your billion-dollar debts with us. It's like Israel was already getting one-third of all our foreign aid!"

"C'mon, Freaksome," Slickboy said, "they are our only dependable allies in the Middle East. We have to overlook little mistakes like that. I mean, peace and democracy are at stake! If we don't control the Russians all over the world, America will just become another Afghanistan. I mean the Russians are really gross!"

"Hey man, you're getting me wrong, I'm not trying to defend what the Soviets are doing," Freaksome said. "I just think that we are all in this terrorism bit together. Everybody feels that they can take away the rights of other people in the world to protect their own. They say that 45,000 civilian lives in El Salvador is the price we have to pay to have liberty in this country."

"Freaksome, you're so totally naive. Sure we use terror, or support terror, to remain on top. But don't you see that all our terror is for a just cause? Don't you see that the terrorists we support are just terrorists?"

Parking rules should reflect students' needs

Editor,

Parking on this campus has been and continues to be a problem for those of us who drive. Many people must drive to work and school and are allowed to buy parking permits authorizing them to use various lots during the day. This is needed.

Campus police are needed to patrol lots and other spaces to insure that these individuals are able to use their spaces.

My concern is over current regulations — are they really suited to the best needs of the students?

On Jan. 25, I parked at the back of the large lot across from the Natatorium. When I returned, a ticket for $7.50 was there to greet me. Maybe this was an atypical day in that there were many empty spaces. Or maybe not. The fact remains that I broke the law and must pay the consequences.

I would not be irritated by this event if I had driven around and around, searching for an empty space, obviously infringing on others' rights. But by driving to the very back of the lot, past numerous empty spaces, I felt no guilt by parking when there was no shortage of space.

I would hope that there are beneficial activities for our campus police other than to issue parking tickets when parking is clearly no problem.

One solution might be to set different hours for non-permit parking in each lot as it becomes available, the times corresponding with the number of vehicles using the lot. While one lot may be full until 5:30 p.m., another might empty early in the afternoon.

Few people can justify waste of unnecessary time and energy. Regulations should be made with a purpose and enforced with common sense. Policies that hinder the use of our already-limited facilities need to be corrected.

Behavior at movie offensive

Editor,

Last Friday, we went to see "Last Tango in Paris" at the Union. We were looking forward to seeing the movie. However, some inconsiderate viewers made it quite difficult to relax and enjoy the show.

Did the two small groups of hecklers really think that the rest of us needed the subtitles read aloud and commented on? Did they think that their ideas about the meaning and social relevance of the film were more interesting than our own? Most of all, did they think we needed their crude and vulgar remarks to help us enjoy the movie? It is a shame that so many people left the movie they had paid to see, simply because a few people insisted on subjecting everyone to their "wit" and "wisdom."

Maybe the situation could have been avoided by informing viewers ahead of time that the movie was not a typical X-rated stag film. Better yet, perhaps the Union Program Council could put a Breathalyzer machine outside Forum Hall and ban all intoxicated individuals from the movies. Or maybe, the films could be shown one night for the serious viewers and one night for the drunks. People might then be able to watch the movies in relative peace.

The suggestions we have made are extreme. We realize that many people are capable of spending the evening in Aggieville and then watching a movie without disturbing others. The only other solution to this problem would be for the jerks who spoiled the movie to learn a little bit of decency and respect for others. But, we honestly don't know if they can handle it. How about it, guys?

Jesse brings morality to campaign

AKRON — My mother-in-law was born in Michigan and raised in Ohio. She is a feminist, college-educated, well-read and Midwestern to her core. She believes in hard work, frugality, honesty and the virtues of her country. She may vote for Jesse Jackson.

Whether she will is yet to be decided. The Ohio primary is not until May and a lot can still happen. But Jane Stubbs said the other night she likes what Jackson says. She likes his emphasis on civil rights, on helping the poor and playing down military solutions. Jackson is the only candidate articulating what is truly important to her. He talks about the moral dimension in politics.

More than my family tells me that Jackson is emerging as a protest candidate. After I wrote critically of Jackson, a number of people told me I was right — but they liked him anyway. What surprised me was that none of the people were black — Jackson's presumed constituency. And none were uninformed. Instead, they acknowledged the man's deficiencies — his inexperience, for instance — but were willing to overlook them. Jackson, they said, has what they want: a moral vision.

What we have here is the classic battle between the mind and the heart. And increasingly Washington, which would prefer even emotions detailed in a memo, is beginning to wonder which one will win. We already have the lesson of Ronald Reagan, whose intellectual qualifications for the presidency remain suspect, but whose leadership qualities do not. In the jargon of politics, Reagan is a thematic candidate. He not only has values, but he unashamedly wears them on his sleeve.

With the exception of Jackson, the same cannot be said for the Democratic candidates. That does not mean that they are valueless. It only means that to one extent or another they have been unable to communicate them. As a result, a whole lot of people who oppose Reagan are suffering from spiritual malnutrition.

Patrick Caddell, former President Carter's pollster, attempted to prove that. After going around Washington for months complaining that the Democratic candidates were the political equivalent of Gertrude Stein's Oakland — there is no "there" there — Caddell invented an imaginary candidate, "Mr. Smith," and polled in his behalf among likely caucus voters in Iowa. He set up a three-way race between "Mr. Smith" and candidates modeled on Walter Mondale and John Glenn. The nonexistent candidate ran away with the field.

People sometimes say they will make sacrifices they in fact will not and, of course, "Mr. Smith" does not exist. But what does exist is a hunger among a significant number of Democrats for a candidate with a moral dimension — for a spiritual side to politics. This should come as no surprise. The hunger for values is a worldwide phenomenon and it manifests itself as violently as suicide attacks in Lebanon and as trivially as the consistent popularity of "Casablanca" — a clumsy yet appealing mix of political and romantic values.

This yearning for the spiritual side of politics, this desire to enlist in a crusade, is as old as mankind. Its absence from the Democratic campaign explains why enthusiasm for the frontrunners is soft in the polls and why Jesse Jackson — minister by training, gadfly by occupation — may emerge as the "Mr. Smith" of this campaign. The other candidates had better listen to my mother-in-law.

University to issue photo ID cards at spring semester pre-enrollment

After an absence of four years, K-State identification cards with photographs will be available beginning in April.

Donald Foster, University registrar, said students, faculty and staff will receive the new IDs during pre-enrollment, April 10-17.

"The first ID will be free of charge," Foster said. If the ID is lost, however, a $5 fee will be assessed to replace it, he said.

The IDs will contain the holder's picture, an optical character recognition (OCR) strip, to be used to check out materials from the library and a magnetic strip.

The magnetic strip will be encoded, when equipment becomes available, to help identify the holder. It will be similar to the strips used on bank cards.

Foster said the cards will include the University logo, the student's name and social security number in raised letters and numbers and the semester validating boxes, all of which are on the current ID.

The new IDs are the result of student request, Foster said. He said many students have indicated that the current IDs are inadequate for identification. One example is large lecture classes which require picture identification for taking exams.

During spring enrollment, pictures will be taken in the ID center in the basement of Farrell Library before students enter the enrollment area. Once enrolled, the IDs will be ready to pick up. The current cards will be turned in at that time.

The cost of the new ID system is about $40,000, Foster said.

"The total price of replacing the IDs will be borne by the University central administration," he said.

Part of the price includes equipment needed for the addition of the new features on the cards.

"We're beginning to get in some of the equipment already," he said.

Foster said the faculty and staff IDs are scheduled to be processed before student enrollment so the system can be tested. In this way, problems can be corrected before students enroll.

Bus firm enters not guilty plea

The Junction City-Fort Riley-Manhattan Transit Company pleaded not guilty Wednesday during arraignment proceedings in Riley County Court for a complaint filed against them concerning a school bus accident Jan. 12.

The complaint followed an accident in which the bus driver and a student were injured. The bus slid off the side of the road while traveling on Riley County Highway 901 and was partially overturned.

Riley County Attorney Colt Knutson filed the complaint Jan. 19, claiming the tires on the bus owned by the company had "inadequate tread depth."

Bob Bruce, owner of the transit company, did not want to comment on the complaint, but said he would try to get a measurement of the tread depth of the tires at the time of the accident.

"No one actually took anything (a measurement), and we're going to have to have something like that from someone considered an expert," Bruce said. "I think we're going to do that, have an outsider come in."

A trial date was set for March 12.

Mailing error may cause AT&T card fraud

By The Associated Press

BEDMINSTER, N.J. — AT&T officials said Wednesday they have mailed an estimated 4,700 telephone credit cards to the wrong customers, and appealed to consumers to "be honest" and not use them fraudulently.

AT&T was in the process of mailing out 47 million credit cards when customers began calling to say they had received cards with the wrong name and telephone number, said Maureen Dvorak, spokeswoman at AT&T's Communications Division headquarters here.

AT&T spokesman Jerry Santos estimated that about 0.01 percent — or 4,700 — cards had been incorrectly mailed. He said he did not know how that figure was determined.

"It's not really a large problem. It is only a small fraction that will cause problems, and we don't think fraud will be a big factor because the error rate is so low," he said.

Dvorak said the firm had set up a hotline for customers to report receiving the wrong card, but that it was too early to tell how many of those calls had come in.

"We're appealing to our customers to help us by reporting any error to us immediately," Dvorak said.

County turns out for write-in vote

MOUND CITY — The first county-wide election by mail in Kansas drew a 70 percent turnout of Linn County voters, who approved a property tax levy of up to one mill to finance services for senior citizens.

"Everything went real smooth," said County Clerk Marion Johnson. "We didn't have a problem at all. I'd like to use it again." Ballots were mailed to voters on Jan. 11. The deadline for returning them was noon Tuesday.

Johnson said authorization for the levy was approved by a vote of 1,612 to 1,041.

Johnson said he was hoping for a turnout of 75 percent to 80 percent. But, he said, some veteran election board officials estimated that there would have been a 40 percent turnout had the election been held at the polls.

Johnson said most of the money raised under the levy will go toward the county meals program for the elderly.

Trailers ruined in Wolf Creek fire

WICHITA — A fire that started near a heater damaged four storage trailers at the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant construction site, according to Kansas Gas and Electric Co.

No injuries were reported and the Tuesday fire was not expected to affect construction at the plant, which is 90 percent complete and expected to begin operation in 1985.

The trailers are used to store hand tools and construction materials. The power plant wasn't involved in the fire, said Lyle Koerper, a KG&E spokesman.

KG&E fire crews called for assistance from the Burlington Fire Department about 10:30 p.m. Monday. Larry Lewis, the department's assistant chief, said four volunteers took two trucks and assisted firefighting efforts for about 2½ hours.

Koerper said a damage estimate wasn't available. The loss was covered by insurance, he said.

Mount St. Helens still bubbling

VANCOUVER, Wash. — Underground volcanic activity has shifted from the south to the north side of a dome-shaped formation in Mount St. Helens' crater, indicating the current eruption cycle isn't over.

The volcano could fire small blasts northward across a two-mile plateau of debris left from its explosive May 18, 1980, eruption or could rain boulders as big as cars on the plateau, Steve Brantley of the U.S. Geological Survey said Tuesday.

Molten rock has been oozing upward in a relatively quiet, dome-building eruption that began Feb. 7, 1982, he said.

Workers caught in document scam

LOS ANGELES — One Los Angeles County worker was fired and another suspended without pay after they and a third person were accused of selling phony birth certificates to undercover immigration officers.

Joe Gonzalez de Leon, a Collections Department clerk, and Joe Sephus Clemmons, a non-permanent clerk in the recorder's office who was fired, were arraigned last Wednesday on a federal charge of knowingly transferring false identification documents to federal officers. U.S. Magistrate Volney V. Brown Jr. set bond at $5,000 each.

They were arrested a day earlier by U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service agents. The third person was arrested Jan. 17.

Policies may violate students' rights

School boards allow testing for drugs

By The Associated Press

ARKADELPHIA, Ark. — Tiring of toothless methods of trying to keep illegal drugs and alcohol out of classrooms, school boards in two Arkansas towns have passed regulations that can require students to submit to breath or urine tests.

The American Civil Liberties Union is concerned that the tests violate students' constitutional rights. But school officials say that the policies are working, and that they have heard little outcry from the communities.

"We're not on a witch hunt," said James Ford, superintendent of the Arkadelphia district. If a student is innocent, "we want him to be innocent. We want him in school."

"Kids are bound to experiment with alcohol or drugs," said Farrell Ford, a counselor in the district. "All we're trying to do with this policy is to make our schools a good place to be," she said.

The Arkadelphia policy went into effect in September 1982, and the small town of Hope, 43 miles away, began enforcing an almost identical program last month.

Under the policies, teachers must report students who act strangely or smell of alcohol or marijuana. Depending on the suspected violation, a principal may require the student to submit to a breath or urine test to prove whether he has been using a narcotic or alcohol. A lie detector may be required to determine ownership of confiscated drugs.

If the tests are positive, the student is suspended for the remainder of the semester and loses all class credit. A second violation results in the student's expulsion for one year, while the third offense leads to permanent expulsion.

Refusal to take the tests can result in suspension for the semester.

Ford said that nine of the 1,200 students in grade 5-12 have been given the urine test, and four were found to have smoked marijuana. A breath test on another student indicated he was intoxicated.

No tests have been given in Hope, a town of 8,800 in poultry farm country near the Texas border, said Hope High School Principal Gerald Jones. Some 1,650 students in grade 6-12 are affected by the policy there.

The urinalysis, performed by a commercial laboratory in Hot Springs, is accurate enough to indicate whether a student has smoked even one marijuana cigarette within the previous seven days, Ford said.

Residents of Arkadelphia, a college town with a population of 10,000, came up with the idea of a testing and drug education program two years ago after the murder of two people involved in drug deals, said Michael O'Quinn, who was president of the school board at the time.

Cindy Launius, the president of Arkadelphia High's student council, said there were many times when students would come to class drunk or stoned.

"They would be belligerent...always swinging their arms and disrupting the classes," she said.

Anthony Young, Hope High School student council president, said some students go to Texarkana, about 25 miles away, to buy alcohol.

Hope police raided several house parties Jan. 13, arresting 30 of the high school's 200 seniors on charges of minor possession.

The Arkansas Chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union said it expects to file suit over the policies, on the grounds that they violate students' rights against unreasonable searches.

"The whole way that the thing is written is a violation of a student's right to privacy. The schools are supposed to be teaching the law, not violating it," Executive Director Sandra Kurjiaka said.

Ford disagrees, contending that schools "are not bound by the strict interpretations of the law because, when a student comes to school, we still have some of that parental power we can wield."

He said that local lawyers and judges reviewed and approved the policy before the board adopted it. None of the more liberal faculty members have objected, and most students have been happy with the policy because it helps take away the peer pressure to use drugs, he said.

THE SCHOLARSHIP THAT LEADS ENGINEERING STUDENTS RIGHT INTO MANAGEMENT.

There's a lot more to an Army ROTC scholarship than tuition, books, lab fees, supplies and up to $1,000 per school year for living expenses.

There's leadership. You start sharpening your ability to lead while you're still in engineering school. So when you graduate as a second lieutenant, you're ready to take charge.

You're trim, fit. You know how to motivate people. And you're capable of managing the thousands of dollars worth of equipment you're in charge of.

And as you progress, you'll discover increasing opportunities to advance your engineering skills, to attend graduate school, while you serve your country.

All the while, you'll be acquiring the management skills that industry leaders look for.

So look into an Army ROTC scholarship. Talk it over with the Professor of Military Science on your campus.

KCC to ease high December bills

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Customers of five electric utilities serving Kansas will be billed this month for only one-third of the $12 million in extra fuel costs resulting from December's severely cold weather, the Kansas Corporation Commission announced Wednesday.

Ordinarily, the commission allows utilities to pass on changes in fuel costs to their customers on a monthly basis.

But the increases in fuel costs caused by December's below-zero temperatures were so great the commission ruled the utilities should spread the increase over a three-month period, beginning this month. The commission estimates the extra fuel costs incurred by the five utilities at $12 million.

Equipment failures at power plants and coal piles which froze over during the cold spell made it necessary for the utilities to buy more expensive power from other sources. The Jeffrey Energy Center, owned and operated by Kansas Power & Light, experienced the greatest problems, according to a statement released by the commission.

The five utilities affected by the commissions ruling are KPL of Topeka, Kansas Gas & Electric of Wichita, Kansas City Power & Light, Western Power Division of Centel Corporation of Great Bend and Empire Electric District of Joplin, Mo.

Only KCPL proposed collecting all of its extra fuel costs in February, but the commission suspended the utility's request, pending a March 7 hearing. The other four utilities proposed spreading the collections over either two or three months.

The commission said it hopes to determine the causes of the coal-handling problems and equipment failures at the hearing.

Budget

14.5 percent increase over current spending. Discounting for inflation, it is a 9.3 percent boost.

Defense budget authority — an indicator of the direction of future spending — is $305 billion, an 18.1 percent increase over current authority, 13 percent after inflation.

"The task of rebuilding our military forces to adequate levels must be carried to completion, and our commitment to provide economic and military support to small, poor nations that are struggling to preserve democracy must be honored," the president declared in the budget message.

But Democratic and Republican leaders alike in Congress have said the president will have to settle for less Pentagon spending, as he has in previous years.

Overall domestic spending is pegged at $523.1 billion and reflects a continuation of the administration's attempt to rein in such programs.

But this year's initiative to cut domestic spending is less ambitious than in past years and even a reduction from the original cuts that the administration contemplated.

Congress is being asked to trim $8.9 billion from the projected increases in a variety of domestic programs, including $2.8 billion from food stamps, Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Medicaid and the like.

Another $2.1 billion would be trimmed by delaying cost-of-living increases — consistent with last year's Social Security rescue legislation — in federal civilian and military pensions.

A group of education, training and health programs would be reduced $1.8 billion.

The remaining $2.2 billion in reductions are scattered among federal aid to local governments, public works and other programs.

These reductions are offset in part by $4.3 billion in requested increases in programs for veterans and "national interest" programs identified as nuclear weapons work in the Energy Department and foreign military and economic aid.

The president's budget forecast that the government will take in $745.1 billion against its $925.5 billion in spending.

About $7.9 billion in revenue increases is recommended, including $3.9 billion that would be raised by taxing employees for employer-paid health insurance premiums that exceed $175 per month for a family and $70 for single people.

The remainder of the additional revenue would come primarily from eliminating special tax exemption and deduction provisions that currently are used by relatively few taxpayers.

Air Force weather forecasters had no long-range prediction for landing day, Feb. 11, but said conditions should be excellent at liftoff time Friday.

The flight essentially will be a rehearsal for the next mission in April, when another shuttle crew is to capture and repair a defective satellite named Solar Max. As McNair said Tuesday, the journey will be filled with "very spectacular novelties."

The most spectacular will be the first space walks without safety lines, with McCandless and Stewart using jet-powered backpacks to maneuver up to 300 feet away from Challenger.

Students face drug charges

K-State Police arrested two Haymaker Hall residents early Wednesday morning on charges of possession with intent to sell and sale of marijuana.

Mark Herz, freshman in agricultural mechanization, and David Todd, freshman in engineering, were arrested at 3 a.m. in the residence hall and booked into the Riley County Jail.

Each appeared in District Court Wednesday afternoon and is free on $1,000 bond.

A preliminary hearing has not yet been set.

Arlan Suderman, Haymaker director, was unavailable for comment.

Wildcat forward Eddie Elder looks for an opening through the arms of Iowa State University's guard Jeff Hornacek, as Cyclones center Sam Hill taunts

K-State edges ISU for Big Eight win

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

Sophomore guard Jonas Cody, in his first start of the year, scored 20 points to spark K-State to its first win of the Big Eight Conference season, 75-69 over Iowa State.

Junior Eddie Elder threw in 24 points and added 13 rebounds, while sophomore Ben Mitchell added 18 inside for the 'Cats. But Cody's play offensively and defensively were what K-State needed to post the win.

"Jonas did an excellent job," K-State Coach Jack Hartman said. "He's a kid that thinks aggressively. If he's going to fall, he's going to fall forward."

"The last two games he's gotten into his groove. Before, he had trouble getting his shot down and it affected his whole game, but he played well," Hartman said.

K-State used a 12-2 scoring outburst midway through the first half to take charge of the contest. Elder and Cody each added four points to help the 'Cats take a 29-20 lead. Meanwhile the Cyclones went cold, hitting only 37 percent from the field in the opening half.

An Elder layup with three seconds left helped the 'Cats post a 35-28 halftime lead.

In the second half, the 'Cats threatened to make the game a blow-out. After the Cyclones cut the lead to four, 39-35, on a jumper by forward Barry Stevens, K-State went to work, scoring eight of the next 10 points to give the 'Cats a 47-37 lead.

K-State kept adding to its lead, in a game that became physical in the final half, with three Cyclones fouling out. The 'Cats built their biggest lead at 60-46 with 8:00 to go.

With a big lead, the 'Cats began to become unglued. K-State missed four front-end attempts in one-and-one situations, to help the Cyclones climb back into the contest. The Cyclone press also forced the 'Cats into some costly turnovers to help their cause.

Stevens, the Big Eight's second-leading scorer with a 23 points per game average, popped a jumper to bring the Cyclones within three, 65-62. Stevens led Iowa State with 21 points before fouling out. After Elder missed a free throw, Cyclone guard Ron Virgil hit a follow shot to cut the 'Cat lead to one with 2:15 remaining.

After a K-State timeout, Elder made up for his earlier charity miss by sinking two foul shots to build the 'Cat lead back to three. A blocked shot by Mitchell stopped the Cyclones momentarily, but junior Lafayette Watkins missed a free throw to give the Cyclones a second chance.

Guard Jeff Hornacek hit one of two free shots to pull the Cyclones within two, but an alley-oop slam dunk by Mitchell put the 'Cat lead back to four with less than a minute to go.

The Cyclones had one more chance to tie. After Cody missed a free throw, Virgil put up a jumper, but missed to keep the score at 69-67. Free throws by sophomore guard Jim Roder gave the 'Cats a four-point lead. Cody iced it for K-State with a pair of free throws and a break-away slam dunk in the last seconds.

"It feels good to win — I don't think it's really sunk in yet," Elder said. "We let it get a little close in the end, but we pulled it out in the end. That's what counts."

Cody said a good practice the day before the game helped him play a better game against the Cyclones.

"I was looking for the shot, because yesterday in practice I hit five or six jumpers in a row," he said. "I wasn't playing with confidence. I went up and down, but the team helped me build my confidence and I went from there."

'Huskers nip Cowboys

By The Associated Press

David Ponce's 5-foot basket at the buzzer gave Nebraska a 54-52 overtime victory over Oklahoma State in a Big Eight Conference basketball game at Lincoln Wednesday night.

The Cowboys had led 31-22 at halftime, but Nebraska connected on its first seven field attempts of the second half, taking the lead 38-35 with 15:48 to go in the game. It was a seesaw affair the rest of the way.

Nebraska scored first in the overtime on a basket by Dave Hoppen. After Oklahoma State's Raymond Crenshaw countered with a basket, Nebraska regained the lead on two free throws by Hoppen. Crenshaw again knotted the score with a basket with 57 seconds remaining.

The Huskers held the ball until with 12 seconds remaining, Ponce drove from the top of the free throw circle to the baseline, twisting to put up the winning basket at the buzzer.

Malcolm Thomas scored 20 points in the first half — matching Colorado's team total — and went on to pour in 28 as Missouri stampeded past the Buffaloes 89-51.

Thomas, a 6-foot-7 transfer, entered the game averaging 12.3 points in the Tigers' four previous games.

Missouri also got a strong effort from Prince Bridges, who finished with 14 points. Bill Roundtree had 11 and center Greg Cavener added 10.

Kings drop third straight

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Forward Larry Bird fired in 32 points, and Kevin McHale came off the bench to add 22 as the Boston Celtics rolled to a 119-110 victory over the Kansas City Kings Wednesday night for their seventh straight National Basketball Association win.

The Celtics, leaders of the Atlantic Division, have now won 27 of their last 31 outings, while the Kings dropped their third straight.

Kansas City, with Eddie Johnson's 15 points and 13 by Steve Johnson in the first half, managed a 57-53 lead at intermission. Eddie Johnson added 8 more in the third period to keep the game close, but Bird's 8-point scoring spurt near the end of the period and Boston led 86-80 at the end of three.

LaSalle Thompson, who finished with 14 points, kept the Kings in the game in the final period, hitting two straight baskets with a little more than four minutes left to narrow Boston's lead 100-99.

However, Dennis Johnson hit a tip-in, and McHale added a jumper as the Celtics pulled away.

Robert Parish added 21 for Boston, and Dennis Johnson chipped in 19. Eddie Johnson led the Kings with 26 points, and Billy Knight had 20 in a losing cause.

Dupree wants to play college ball this season

By The Associated Press

HATTIESBURG, Miss. — Marcus Dupree, once touted for the Heisman Trophy but now a two-time university dropout, wants to play college ball this year. But he's also listening to overtures from the professional ranks, a close friend said Wednesday.

It's not clear how interested the professionals are in Dupree, who still has college eligibility.

Dupree, who left Oklahoma last fall and quit the University of Southern Mississippi on Tuesday, is blocked by NCAA rules from playing football at major colleges until 1985. He is considered a prime pro prospect, a sure No. 1 draft choice in both the National Football League and its new rival, the United States Football League.

But the NFL emphatically restated its policy on Tuesday against drafting undergraduates — in fact, Dupree won't be eligible for the NFL draft until 1987, the year after his class graduates.

The USFL, which signed Herschel

Walker last year after his junior year in college, determined after the outcry from colleges that followed Walker's signing that it would abide by the same rules. The league had no comment on the Dupree situation except to note that a judge in Los Angeles had made a tentative ruling which may overthrow the USFL eligibility rule as a violation of antitrust law.

The pro option was held out for Dupree by Kenneth Fairley, a Hattiesburg businessman who has emerged as the running back's chief spokesman and may be his next employer — Dupree told USA Today that he may take a job as a construction worker at a funeral home Fairley owns. But Fairley also said Dupree would play for a small-college team just to play football next fall.

"He's interested in an NAIA school or an NCAA Division III school because he would be eligible to play next season," Fairley said. "The main thing is that he wants to play football."

'Cats' Leiding's first year is one of adjustments

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

Adjusting may be a good word to describe what the Lady 'Cats' Sue Leiding has been doing lately.

She has adjusted from the old-fashioned six-on-six basketball game she played during her high school days in Oklahoma to the typical fast-paced and physical collegiate contests she now must play.

There also has been adjusting from a 35-point, five-rebound per game average during her senior year at Tulsa, Okla., Union High School to a sometimes low-scoring, backup role behind a more experienced K-State starting five.

If recent performances are any indication, Leiding has handled the adjustments very well. On Jan. 18, Leiding sank four last-minute free throws and tallied 12 points in helping the Lady 'Cats hang on for a 76-71 victory over Oklahoma State University. She came back three days later to score a career-high 14 points in a 88-70 win over the University of Oklahoma.

It may not always be a case of double-figure scoring for the 6-foot-2 freshman, who is averaging only about four points per game as a Lady 'Cat reserve. But that's where Leiding does her adjusting — adjusting to those times when she may not contribute as much as she did in the OSU and OU contests.

"When I came up here, I knew I wouldn't be starting," Leiding said. "But knowing it and going through it are two different things. Right now I've accepted my role — just giving my support from the bench and giving my 110 percent."

Giving that 110 percent often comes during practice, where Lady 'Cats Head Coach Lynn Hickey works on fine-tuning Leiding's game.

"The thing that pleases me is that Sue works so hard in practice," Hickey said. "She's very tough physically."

And when Leiding takes the court, her behavior is a definite contrast to the quiet, off-court actions she displays. She's much more aggressive while competing, she said.

"I think I'm a lot different on the court," Leiding said. "I'm trying to prove myself. I don't stand back — I take the initiative."

Although Hickey said she wants Leiding to "make moves to get the ball and score," Leiding said defense also is another area where she needs improvement.

"The biggest transition has been getting my defensive skills back," said Leiding, who played on the offensive end of six-on-six basketball during her four years of high school. "That's what is really holding me back."

But Leiding was anything but holding back in her 12-point performance against OSU. Hitting the all-important free throws toward the game's end was exciting, but not as nerve-racking as some may think, she said.

"I was very relieved when I stepped up there," she said. "I didn't have any negative thoughts (concerning missing the free throws). It was all positive."

It is Hickey who is positive when it comes to assessing Leiding's progress, which she described as "super."

"We just want her to play with as much intensity as she can and to go as hard as she can," Hickey said. "She's a very intelligent player. All we have to do is tell her one time, and she will try to work it (a problem) out the next time down the court."

Making those adjustments are simply what it takes when it comes to perfecting her work — both academically and athletically, Leiding said.

"I'd like to keep my GPA 3.0 or better," said Leiding, a freshman in business education. "One of my goals is to keep my free-throw shooting up and to keep my confidence up."

Confidence may be in ample supply when Leiding describes the 11-ranked Lady 'Cats' chances at continued success this season. Anything is possible, she said, even a national championship.

"I'm looking for the Big Eight championship and the national championship," she said. "I think right now we're starting to play like we know we can. We have great guards and great quickness. We're starting to pull together like we should."

Sue Leiding has adjusted from being a starter in high school to being a reserve center for the Lady 'Cats.

Competitive spirit pushes Leonard

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Sugar Ray Leonard said Wednesday "I feel in two or three years I should accomplish everything I want to."

What he wants to achieve is to become welterweight and junior middleweight champion again and to win the undisputed middleweight title held by Marvelous Marvin Hagler.

"Money always plays a major role for me," said Leonard, who made about $35 million before retiring as undisputed welterweight champion in 1982, and who is reportedly getting some $3 million to come back against Kevin Howard Feb. 25 at Worcester, Mass.

"But I'm driven by what's inside of me, my competitive spirit."

Leonard won 32 of 33 fights, 23 by knockout, and won the undisputed welterweight championship and the World Boxing Association junior middleweight title before retiring Nov. 9, 1982, six months after undergoing surgery for a partially detached retina of the left eye.

"My return to the ring has had a major impact on the world,"

Leonard said. "A number of people have been opposed to my return."

However, Leonard again said he feels he's not taking a risk.

"Thank God, that (the injury) is past," he said. "I'll be 100 percent for the fight."

"I wouldn't come back if I had an eye injury or any other kind of injury," said the 23-year-old Howard. "Even if I don't hit his eye, it might go on its own."

But Howard said he is pleased about Leonard's decision, which will bring him a reported $300,000 and a chance to make a name for himself.

He also said he is aware that he probably wouldn't be getting the chance if he hadn't lost two of his last three fights — 10-round decisions to Marlon Starling and Mark Medal last year. And he said he is aware of the talk about his just being an opponent — a victim to launch Leonard's comeback.

"People call me and say, 'you've got no chance; you're fighting Sugar Ray and he's bad,'" said Howard, who is 19-4-1, with 10 knockouts.

"Sugar Ray ain't no God," said the Philadelphia fighter. "He's got two hands like me."

KU fans take basketball seriously

Somehow it didn't seem right to have fun.

Last Saturday, I watched K-State get demolished by the hated Kansas Jayhawks in a game that was, for the most part, over by halftime. To help the beating go quicker, I checked out the atmosphere in Allen Field House.

KU fans take basketball seriously. The key word is tradition. They never hesitate to tell you that Dr. James Naismith, the inventor of basketball, coached at KU — even if he did have a losing record. Wilt Chamberlain is seen as the patron saint of KU centers — his career in the late '50s is still committed to the memories of die-hard fans. Darnell Valentine, JoJo White — the list of KU greats goes on.

The problem with having a winning tradition is arrogance. Attitude is the key difference between K-State and KU fans. It seems when a K-State player makes a mistake on the court — which has happened plenty lately — "Cats fans try not to get too worked up about it. With KU fans, a mistake by one of their boys should be a capital offense. KU players do not make mistakes — it's too serious.

Once after KU player Ron Kellogg took a bad shot, one KU faithful began screaming over how stupid he was and how he didn't deserve to be a Jayhawk. I imagined visions of KU All-Americans dancing in his head. I turned around to see a crazed alumnus dressed in a blue outfit with a red face from screaming all afternoon. There were many red-faced KU fans, not embarrassed, but certainly hoarse.

The two biggest topics KU fans screamed about were the referees and K-State Coach Jack Hartman. In most games the referees gather a bit of abuse, but in Lawrence I began to wonder about their personal safety. The only right call was one whistled on K-State.

Jack Hartman gets under the skin of KU fans because he beats them regularly. Hartman is one of the few coaches in the Big Eight enjoying a winning record against the Jayhawks, with more wins in KU's Allen Field House than any other coach. They hate how he never yells and screams at officials and acts so, well, civilized. Secretly, I think many KU fans wish he was the Jayhawk coach.

TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

I think what I'll remember most about the game happened in the final minutes. KU was up by about 20 points and the Jayhawks turn the ball over. A KU crazy stood up and screamed at his team to quit fooling around, beat K-State into the ground. Losing five times in a row to a team causes a certain amount of bitterness.

But as I watched all the craziness going on around me: the Wildcats hung in effigy, the Greg Dreiling fan club, Turgeon's Surgeons (a group of loonies dedicated to the little KU guard Mark Turgeon) and the 15,000 other 'Hawk faithful, so help me I enjoyed myself.

With K-State alumni as parents — programming me to hate anything that wore blue and red in the state of Kansas — it's not easy for me to say KU has good tradition or a great college basketball atmosphere. But from what I saw last Saturday, they do.

Atmosphere at K-State has suffered lately. K-State fan support has declined with the team suffering a down season. Less than half of the student tickets were sold and attendance is down several thousand people per game. K-State has always been known for its great fan support, so it's a little strange to see the 'Cats playing to half-full houses.

It was fun to be in Lawrence, to be part of one of the great rivalries in college sports. That atmosphere has been missing at K-State the last couple of years. I hope when KU comes to Manhattan Feb. 25, 'Cats faithful won't have given up on their team completely. I hope they'll show as much insanity as their Jayhawk counterparts.

K-State fans can take their basketball seriously too.

Wilson requests early prison release

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Outfielder Willie Wilson of the Kansas City Royals has requested early release from his three-month prison term on a drug conviction.

The office of U.S. Magistrate J. Milton Sullivan said Wednesday there was no indication when the judge would rule on the request by Wilson, who will complete two months of his sentence at the Federal Correctional Institution at Fort Worth, Texas, Monday.

Wilson's request was filed in U.S.

District Court in Kansas City, Kan., Friday, the same day that Sullivan issued a one-page order denying a similar request from Jerry Martin, a former member of the Royals.

Wilson, Martin and Willie Aikens, another former Royal, were sentenced to three-month prison terms after pleading guilty to charges of attempting to possess cocaine. Baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn suspended the three players from baseball for one year, but said he would review that action May 15.

The Kansas City Times, meanwhile, reported Wednesday that Jack Sands, Wilson's agent, says Wilson has "admitted he had experienced cocaine" and has come to terms with the pressure of his incarceration.

"He's learned a lot about how to deal with stress, how to handle the public on a day-to-day basis, what his role is as a ballplayer," Sands said. "And while he was not a constant user, he has admitted he had experienced cocaine from time to time. He is prepared to talk about the problems of drug use."

Royals General Manager John

Schuerholz said he met for two hours with Wilson last month at the Fort Worth prison and noticed a change in Wilson's demeanor.

"The most obvious change was what I would describe as a rather mellow attitude on his part regarding his problem and his being confined in a facility. There was none of the anger or shedding of blame that seemed to come out of some of his last public comments," Schuerholz said. "To the contrary, he was very willing to accept the blame for his problem."

NCAA declines to comment on Rozier receiving money

By The Associated Press

MISSION, Kan. — The National College Athletic Association declined comment Wednesday on a statement by Mike Rozier that the Heisman Trophy winner received money while playing at Nebraska.

Rozier, in training with the Pittsburgh Maulers of the United States Football League, told the Pittsburgh Press that "some people" sent him money while he was playing for the Huskers.

"Our policy simply is not to comment on whether we will look into matters concerning possible violations of NCAA regulations," David Berst, NCAA enforcement director, told the Associated Press.

"The school can provide an allowance in lieu of on-campus room and board," Berst said. "The amount must be commensurate with the average cost a student normally would incur living and eating in off-campus facilities. It varies from one school to the next and is determined by the school's office of financial aid."

Accounting fraternity offers tips for completing tax forms

(Editor's note: This is the first of a two-part listing of income tax preparation tips. They were written by Beta Alpha Psi, an accounting fraternity. While based on factual information, neither Beta Alpha Psi, the Collegian nor K-State can be responsible for any consequences that may arise. If further assistance is needed, consult a professional tax consultant.)

1. MANY PEOPLE WONDER about the difference between the long tax form, the short form and the EZ form. The form 1040, or long form, is the standard form for filing individual income tax returns. It has lines for income, adjustments, deductions and credits from all sources. The 1040A, or short form, has only limited income and adjustments that a more "average" return may have. The 1040EZ is only for single filers with no dependents. All taxpayers may use the 1040 if they wish, but the 1040A and the 1040EZ will save time for those eligible.

2. TAXPAYERS MAY ITEMIZE their deductions if the total of their expenses for interest, contributions, losses, certain taxes, adjusted medical expenses and miscellaneous items is greater than their zero bracket amount (formerly called the standard deduction).

Currently, it is $3,400 for married couples filing jointly and qualifying widow(er)s; $2,300 for single persons and heads of households and $1,700 for married persons filing separately.

The tax table includes the zero bracket amount, so taxpayers who itemize deductions must subtract it from their total itemized deductions. To itemize, use schedule A with your tax return.

3. NOT EVERYONE WHO works is required to file a tax return. The gross income limitation is different for those under the age of 65, single or married filing jointly.

For example, a single 20-year-old can earn up to $3,300 without filing. A married couple over the age of 68 can earn up to $7,400 without filing.

Even if you are not required to file, you may qualify for a refund if any income tax was withheld by your employer. Also, credit for the elderly or earned income credit may apply.

4. CHARITABLE contributions are now tax deductible for everyone, even if you do not itemize. In 1983, 25 percent of the first $100 of contributions to qualified organizations (public libraries, museums, Red Cross, etc.) may be deducted in determining taxable income. For 1984, the maximum is 25 percent of the first $300.

5. THE EARNED INCOME credit is available to qualified taxpayers with adjusted gross income of $10,000 or less. Generally, the taxpayer must have some form of earned income (salaries, wages, self-employment earnings, etc.), and provide a home for a dependent child.

Other conditions exist allowing head of household filers to claim the credit. This tax credit will be allowed even if it exceeds the total tax bill. Check the instructions in your tax return for complete details.

6. A SPECIAL DEDUCTION for a married couple is allowed when they both work. Generally, 10 percent of the qualified earned income of the lesser-earning spouse may be deducted. Attach schedule W to your tax return to take advantage of this special provision.

7. A TAX CREDIT of up to 30 percent of employment-related expenses is allowed for dependent-care. The maximum expense allowed is $2,400 for two or more qualifying individuals.

Expenses for household services and care of a dependent child under age 15 or a dependent spouse generally qualifies. Form 2261 is used to compute the amount of credit allowed.

8. FOR 1983, medical expenses in excess of 5 percent of adjusted gross income are allowed as an itemized deduction. Hospitalization insurance premium; doctor, dentist, and hospital bills and eye glasses all qualify as medical expenses. Actual transportation expenses or an optional rate of nine cents per mile also are allowed. Medicine and drugs in excess of 1 percent of adjusted gross income also are deductible.

In 1984, the 1 percent floor for medicine and drugs is eliminated, but only prescription drugs and insulin will qualify. Use schedule A to compute your medical expense deduction.

Civil rights group denounces Meese

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Denouncing White House Counselor Edwin Meese III's record on civil rights as "scandalous" and "extremist," the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights on Thursday announced a campaign aimed at blocking his confirmation as attorney general.

"Bluntly put, we oppose the nomination because, on the basis of our observations over the past three years, we do not believe Ed Meese, as the nation's chief law enforcement officer, would enforce, vigorously and objectively, our nation's civil rights laws," said Ralph Neas, executive director of the conference.

The conference is an umbrella organization that represents the nation's major civil rights groups.

Neas said the conference, which has 165 member groups, intends to lead a "grass-roots campaign to educate the public, the press and the Congress" about Meese's record before hearings on the nomination are held by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"The extreme civil rights positions taken by Mr. Meese and the Reagan administration are scandalous," Neas said. He stated as evidence "their efforts to defeat a strong and effective Voting Rights Act, to oppose the Equal Rights Amendment, to relax the obligations of school systems for educating handicapped children, to restrict constitutional remedies that have long been available and to generally weaken almost all our civil rights laws..."

Neas said his group faulted Meese for his participation in the administration's attempt to grant tax exempt status to schools which discriminate, to abolish the Legal Services Corporation and to replace members of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission with those who agreed with administration policies.

"The actions and attitudes of Edwin Meese as presidential counselor are, by themselves, deeply disturbing," Neas said, reading a conference statement. "But when you combine the possible confirmation of Ed Meese with the Department of Justice's current record of non-enforcement with respect to civil rights laws, you have a Justice Department in constant conflict with the Constitution and the courts, and the rule of law itself is imperiled."

Joseph Raub, a long-time Washington civil rights lawyer who appeared with Neas, likened the campaign against Meese to the battles against President Nixon's nominations to the Supreme Court of federal appeals court judges Clement Haynsworth Jr. in 1969 and G. Harrold Carswell in 1970.

Staff aides said committee hearings have not been scheduled yet because the nomination has not been submitted formally.

President Reagan nominated Meese to succeed William French Smith, who is resigning to return to private life.

Shultz denies charges by Nicaraguan leader

By The Associated Press

CARACAS, Venezuela — Secretary of State George Shultz said Thursday that Nicaragua's rulers are suppressing freedom of speech and religion and "must be worried" about the survival of their leftist government.

Shultz dismissed an allegation, made Wednesday by Nicaraguan junta leader Daniel Ortega, that the Kissinger commission on Central America secretly recommended to the White House that the United States invade Nicaragua and El Salvador to protect U.S. interests.

Shultz told a news conference the charge was a "figment of his (Ortega's) imagination" and shows that "Mr. Ortega and his colleagues must be worried."

"If I were them I'd be worried too. After all they are the people who betrayed their revolution. They are the people who have harassed the church and the pope. They are the people who declared an amnesty and found 1,000 Miskito Indians leaving the country," Shultz said.

"They are the people who suppress the press. They are the people who built up an armed force that goes beyond anything that anyone

Fire injures 2-year-old boy, damages house extensively

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

A 2-year-old boy is in stable condition after being rescued from a house fire at 905 Colorado Thursday.

According to Manhattan Fire Chief Bill Smith, the Manhattan Fire Department received a call at 9:52 a.m. Thursday through the 911 emergency telephone number saying that a house was on fire and a child was in the house.

The home is the residence of the Christopher Gilbert family.

Smith said Gilbert was able to get his 1½-year-old daughter out of the house before firefighters arrived at the scene. Fireman Ernie Hamilton went in the house and found 2-year-old Dusty Gilbert on the dining room floor unconscious, Smith said. He said the child was taken outside where resuscitation was performed. The child was revived at the scene and taken to Memorial Hospital, where he is being treated for first- and second-degree burns and probably smoke inhalation, Smith said. Hospital officials declined to comment further on the boy's condition.

Hospital officials said Christopher Gilbert also suffered first-degree burns on the back and a severe cut on the arm as a result of trying to re-enter the house to rescue his son. He was treated and released.

Smith said the fire was caused by Dusty playing with matches. He

Student body presidential candidates state views in forum

By MIKE TURNER
Government Editor

Student recruitment, advising quality and the improvement of Farrell Library were among topics covered at a debate between student body presidential candidates Thursday in the Union Cafeteria.

The four candidates addressed an audience of approximately 60 at the event, which was sponsored by the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee.

Current Student Body President Jerry Katlin, senior in public administration, moderated the debate, and each candidate had equal time to respond to the question, "Assuming you are elected as student body president, what do you see as the major problems and obstacles facing your administration?"

Tracy Turner, junior in economics, said student recruitment would be his "ultimate issue." Turner said the University would soon encounter many problems if more students are not recruited to K-State.

Turner said there were about 29,900 high school seniors in Kansas in 1982-83. By 1991, only 24,400 seniors are estimated to be enrolled in state high schools, he said.

"Declining enrollment is here to stay," Turner said. He said K-State would qualify for more state funds and would be in a better position to lobby in the Kansas Legislature if more students attended K-State.

If elected, Turner said he would establish a student ambassador coordinating council. He said K-State currently has several ambassador programs.

"I would like these groups to work together," he said.

Dana Hawkins, senior in journalism and mass communications, said she also thinks student recruitment would be important in the future, but said K-State has strong existing ambassador programs.

Hawkins said she thinks offering ambassador training seminars for credit would be a good way to encourage more students to take part in the ambassador programs.

Ken Heinz, junior in computer science, said he is not against student recruitment, but the issue is not high on his priority list.

"The best recruitment (effort) is to satisfy current students," Heinz said.

K-State should not seek "mass numbers" of students, but quality students, Heinz said.

Eddie Rodriguez, junior in pre-law, said he thinks recruitment is important because having more students would permit K-State to accomplish more things financially.

Rodriguez said he would focus on non-traditional recruitment efforts.

"We need to get students out to tell the K-State story," he said. "We need students who are fueled and charged."

Rodriguez also said it is important to focus on retaining students who are currently enrolled. He said one way to keep students is to improve the advising system.

Four out of 10 people who enter college never receive their degree, Rodriguez said. Advisers need to be there, he said.

Heinz said a recent committee had determined advising in the pre-professional majors was generally good, but advising in business and some other areas was poor or unacceptable.

Heinz said he would look at each college individually. "Each college knows what is best for its students," he said.

Turner said he would support an advising evaluation system similar to that used to evaluate faculty each semester. Students could use computer cards to help identify weaknesses in the advising program, he said.

Rodriguez said his major concern is getting Farrell Library accredited with the Association of Research Libraries. "Good libraries attract good students," he said.

All candidates agreed the hours at Farrell should be expanded to accommodate students who wish to study late.

Heinz said he does not think the entire library should stay open, just the basement and one or two floors.

Hawkins said K-State President

Astronauts to test jet packs in first untethered spacewalk

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Challenger was readied Thursday for Friday's breakfast-time launch of National Aeronautics and Space Administration's 10th shuttle mission. The mission is called the "Buck Rogers flight" for its test of a jet-pack to propel free-flying astronauts across space.

Weather was "super" and the five astronauts "ready to have a good time," officials said.

"I imagine when I go out there, the heart rate will go up a little bit, the view will be fantastic," said mission specialist Robert Stewart.

Liftoff was scheduled for 8 a.m. EST. Shuttle program manager Glynn Lunney said of the crew: "They've been in training for some time for this flight. They feel comfortable with it. They'll all be glad to get on orbit."

The spaceship was pronounced in ideal condition by NASA countdown engineers.

The business end of the eight-day flight — delivery of two satellites — was to come early in the mission. But most interest focused on next Tuesday and Thursday when Bruce McCandless and Stewart are to strap themselves into chair-like "Manned Maneuvering Units" and become the first humans to flit into space without a lifeline.

In previous spacewalks, astronauts were connected by cord to their ship. To use the shuttle on repair missions, crews need to move freely through space to retrieve malfunctioning satellites. The 10th mission is a dress rehearsal for the 11th, when an astronaut will pull in the Solar Max satellite to swap out a bad electronic box. MMUs will be instrumental for astronauts who help put together the space station being proposed in the 1985 budget.

Unlike Buck Rogers, the 1930s comic strip hero who slept 500 years to awaken in the 25th Century, NASA astronauts will control their travels with bursts of nitrogen gas fired from 24 jets on the backpack. Rogers did it by donning a belt made of invertin, "a synthetic element of great reverse weight which falls away from the center of the Earth instead of toward it."

Of the astronauts, only commander Vance D. Brand has flown in space before.

Navy Cmdr. Robert Gibson, 37, flew combat missions in Southeast Asia; Stewart, 41, a lieutenant colonel, is the first Army flyer to go into space; and McCandless, 46, is in the Navy. Ronald E. McNair, 33, is a physicist who holds a doctorate from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Assistant professor earns award

Mark Spire, assistant professor of surgery and medicine, has been given the "Award for Excellence in Preventive Veterinary Medicine" by the American Association of Bovine Practitioners.

The award recognized Spire's "herd health management program designed for beef producers." It was sponsored by MSD AGVET, a division of Merck & Co. Inc., and presented recently at the annual AABP meeting.

Preventive medicine makes up 60 percent of Spire's practice, with 5,200 cows and calves and 4,700 feeder calves on regular herd health programs.

Spire was presented a specially designed plaque which features an original bronze casting that symbolizes the concept of preventive medicine. In addition to the plaque, a $1,500 general scholarship was given to the KSU Foundation to be awarded for scholarships in Spire's name by MSD AGVET.

Student Tribunal reinstates Rodriguez on election ballot

Student Tribunal has reinstated the name of Eddie Rodriguez, junior in pre-law, on the voting ballot for the Feb. 8 student elections.

Rodriguez, candidate for student body president, failed to turn in his initial expenditure report by the Election Committee's Jan. 25 deadline, and according to election rules, his name was removed from the ballot.

Kurt Yowell, chancellor of Tribunal and junior in agricultural economics, said reasons for the decision would be released to Rodriguez and the election committee at a later date.

said the fire probably was smoldering, and when Gilbert heard cries from his son, he went to investigate in the child's bedroom. The draft from the door opening spread the fire throughout the first floor.

"When we got there he (Christopher Gilbert) was incoherent," Smith said, "as anyone would be if their child was in that situation. He kept wanting to get back in the house to get his son.

"We had to put on breathing apparatus," Smith said. "The heat was intense and the smoke was terrible. It was good response by our people. Everything worked out."

Smith estimated the fire caused a total of $22,000 in damages. Damage to the structure was estimated to be $12,000, and its contents are valued at $10,000. Jack Roets, captain of the unit which answered the call, said no firemen were injured, and a female German shepherd and nine puppies were taken from the basement of the home.

Senate advocates mailing of diplomas

A resolution supporting the elimination of K-State's tentative grade policy was unanimously approved by Student Senate at its Thursday meeting.

According to a statement prepared by Kent Barnow, chairman of the Academic Affairs Committee, the tentative grade policy was established to allow graduating students to receive their diplomas at the graduation ceremonies. The policy calls for the spring semester to end on a Wednesday so diplomas can be prepared and records checked. No time is allowed between dead week and finals week.

Elimination of the policy would make finals begin on the Monday following dead week rather than the Friday of dead week. In addition, diplomas would be mailed to students after graduation as in previous years, instead of being awarded at the ceremonies.

"This change would give students and faculty an additional two days to prepare for final exams, without shortening the academic semester," Barnow said.

Barnow said he and other committee members discussed the policy with a number of students and faculty and found support for its elimination.

"Students said they feel that the most important aspect of commencement ceremonies is the forum the ceremonies create that permits family, friends and others to celebrate the special occasion with the student," he said. "The granting of diplomas is secondary."

Eliminating the policy would help all students, said Bill Sullivan, graduate senator.

"This would afford more time to study for finals, not just for seniors, but for all students," he said.

The resolution will not eliminate the current policy. Faculty Senate must make the final policy change. The resolution was intended to show student support for elimination of the policy.

First reading was heard on a bill to revise the Student Governing Association constitution and bylaws. Lori Leu, senate chairman, said the revisions were mostly a "house cleaning" measure. She said there are sections of the documents which are not in agreement and some that are outmoded.

Currency collection shows world history

Every country in the world, including some that are no longer in existence, is represented in an exhibit of more than 300 bank notes on the second floor of the Union this week.

The display is sponsored by the International Coordinating Committee and the Union Program Council Art Committee.

Larry Kaplan, graduate in history, is the coordinator of the "Culture Through Currency" exhibit.

"The purpose (of the display) is to briefly demonstrate the variety as well as the continuity of our world's primary medium of monetary exchange," Kaplan said. "The paper currencies of the world offer more than expedient means of monetary exchange. They are, in most cases, descriptive works of art in all shapes, sizes and colors."

Whether communist or capitalist, eastern or western, a variety of countries are represented by the bank notes.

Portraits of notables, architecture, wildlife, military exploits and art are featured on the bills, giving insight to their respective cultures.

Kaplan began collecting bank notes in 1976 and now owns more than 2,000 bills.

"This is an excellent hobby to pursue, especially for somebody who is interested in world affairs — past and present — into different cultures and into aesthetics of the art," he said. "There is something in this for everybody."

Kaplan said he acquired bills through foreign exchanges, international students, travelers and mail orders.

"Most of the bills were found in junk stores, antique shops and coin shops," he said, adding that the average price he paid for each note was 10 to 15 cents.

"This hobby is obscure. It's not like stamp or coin collecting," he said. "You can lose a fortune in this hobby because it is not an investment. It is a hobby that is pretty and that is what you pay for. If you want to sell it, you won't get anything for it."

"It's a view of everything our world stands for. It's fascinating in that respect," he said.

Serbian culture shines through in band's music

By BECKY WILEY
Collegian Reporter

There's something different about Rooms 612 and 638 in Haymaker Hall. Instead of the sounds of Duran Duran or Michael Jackson, Serbian Folk Music blares from the stereos.

Pete and Paul Bajich, both freshmen in general, and their brother Boris, sophomore in business management, don't just listen to the music though. They, along with their older brother Robert, who works in Lenexa, formed the Bajich Brother's Tamburitza Orchestra and have been playing the folk music for three years.

"We know the Serbian language because my dad taught it to us. It's one of the languages of Yugoslavia, which is where he's from," Paul said.

Their musical careers started in elementary school when they all took violin lessons. The brothers learned to play instruments of the Tamburitza family after some elders in their church taught them how to play the brac (pronounced brock) as part of their Serbian cultural background. The instrument is similar to the lead guitar.

"The brac is the hardest instrument to learn, therefore, it was easier for us to learn the others. Now, Boris plays the bugaria, which is similar to a guitar too, but he plays the chords. Paul plays the brac. Robert plays the cello and I play the string bass," Pete said.

The brothers perform most often at events held in their church hall in Kansas City, Kan., or in the Serbian church halls of Chicago. They play for banquets, choir concerts, dances and weddings.

"Our biggest thrill though," Paul said, "was at The Rafter's, a bar in Chicago. It's a landmark bar. I mean, if you're Serbian and you go to Chicago, you have to go to this bar. The most well-known Serbian musical group is from that area."

"Anyway, we played at this bar for New Year's 1983, and it was exciting because the place was packed. The owners said it hadn't been that crowded since the bar opened. There were also a lot of other Serbian groups that had heard of us and wanted to check us out to see how good we were. We played well that night, which was sort of our big debut, so we've gotten a lot of bookings from that experience," he said.

The orchestra has performed in such cities as St. Louis, Omaha, and Milwaukee and will play in Houston and Phoenix during the next two months.

There's always one thing that the people want to hear, Pete said.

"One of the most popular songs we do is called 'Oj Jelo Jelo' (pronounced Oh Yelo Yelo). We play this song when we're in a bar and a bunch of people come up and stand around us," Pete said.

"Everybody knows the words to it and sings along because it's a medley of songs that most Serbian people learn when they are young," he said.

The brothers plan to record an album in June at a studio in Kansas City, but said not to bother looking for it at the local record stores.

"I know it won't sell much in record stores, but we could do a big business with mail orders to our house. People from all over the United States have heard of us, and several of them have asked us when we're going to make one," Paul said.

Pete said the brothers often play for donations.

"If we bring a good crowd in and the people spend money on the food or drinks, they'll (the owners) say 'Oh they did a good job, we'll give them a good donation,'" Pete said.

The orchestra's talents and tastes aren't just limited to Serbian music.

"We've played for about three or four American weddings, so we play the traditional songs that people dance to at weddings — songs sung by Ray Price and Elvis Presley," Boris said.

He said the brothers have played in a couple of Greek restaurants, so they played as many Greek songs as they could along with contemporary American music.

The Bajich brothers are often told to listen to or play some "real" music, but they say they just ignore it.

"Right now, I have five tapes in my room, and four of them have Serbian music on them. We were brought up with this kind of music. If we played music on the record player, it was Serbian," Boris said.

"We really weren't pushed into it like some kids are forced to take piano lessons," he said. "It's just something we've always wanted to do."

Funding for shelters necessary

Battered women shelters in Kansas receive money through the United Way, federal revenue-sharing funds, private donations and other sources. Varying donations cause the budgets for these shelters to fluctuate drastically from year to year. Something needs to be done to remedy this uncertainty.

The City of Lawrence reported a shelter budget decrease of $40,000 from 1982 to 1983, while service increased from 238 to 359 people. Manhattan's Crisis Center receives more than $20,000 annually from city revenue-sharing funds. Another source for that income will have to be found in 1984 since the city donated a house instead of the cash.

Representatives from battered women's shelters in Lawrence and Topeka have urged lawmakers to provide "a stable renewable source of funding" for domestic violence programs.

It is not a question of need for the services these shelters offer. The Young Women's Christian Association has 210 shelters or service programs in 30 states. Between 1978 and 1980, shelter was given to 46,100 women and children and counseling given to 50,000 women.

The Manhattan Crisis Center, which serves victims of domestic abuse and rape, sheltered 591 people in 1983. This number increased 27 percent from 1982 and does not include the number of calls received, but only the number of women whose cases were deemed serious enough to require housing. A woman who can seek refuge with a friend or relative is encouraged to do so.

The Manhattan Crisis Center is for people who don't have alternatives. Often the victims of spouse abuse have nothing but the clothes on their backs and the change in their pockets because their husbands alone have access to the checkbook.

Since 1964 when the first shelter for battered women opened in Pasadena, Calif., women have been meeting a need that has always existed by providing help to victims who thought they had no right to cry out. A change in attitudes and laws are making women less afraid to report sexual abuse. And when a woman finally has the courage to make that phone call or walk out the door, there should be a place open for her to go, and not a sign on a door that reads, "closed due to lack of funds."

Increasing the amount paid for marriage licenses from $17 to $25 is one method of raising money that has been suggested to Kansas legislators.

Fourteen states channel funds for domestic violence programs by imposing a surcharge on marriage licenses. This seems like a logical source of revenue. Therefore, those who abuse within the institution of marriage have contributed to shelters for their victims.

How Army treats homosexuals

Recently the U.S. Army began an investigation into alleged homosexual activity by 26 enlisted women at Fort Leavenworth. Of those, eight have been "offered" honorable discharges.

Each branch of the armed forces has its own regulations barring homosexual persons and activity, in accordance with Pentagon policy that "homosexuality is incompatible with the mission of the U.S. Army (Navy, Air Force, Marines)." To be fair, the U.S. Army (and other branches) doesn't claim the incompatibility arises from the immorality or sinfulness of homosexuality. Even the U.S. Army seems to realize that morality is an individual perception.

Instead, we are told that homosexuality poses practical problems in the military. Two years ago a U.S. Army spokeswoman summed it up: "Homosexuals are just not suitable for military service." Perhaps she should have explained then why it is persons whose forced dismissals have come to light have consistently been regarded as good, dependable soldiers, often with ten or more years of service. The military had no problem with them, until the stigma of homosexuality arose. Then they were suddenly not suitable for service.

In fact, the military is so homophobic (of or relating to the fear or dislike of homosexuality), it can and does discharge persons who only display what it calls homosexual tendencies, such as femininity in men and masculinity in women. Two years ago the U.S. Navy discharged a sailor even though she had been acquitted of allegations of lesbian activity by the Navy's own investigative panel. A year before that, the Air Force settled out of court with a gay man who won, on a technicality, the right to be reinstated. The U.S. Air Force paid him $160,000 not to re-enlist.

These kind of activities make it seem the military is more concerned with cleaning up and maintaining its conservative image than ensuring the well-being of the services. The military, however, says there are important reasons for keeping homosexuals out of the service.

First, homosexuals are a great security risk because of the potential for blackmail. If there is any truth at all to this claim, it is only because the U.S. Army forces homosexuals to conceal themselves. If one could truly "be all that you can be," any of those so-called security risks would disappear. It's not very effective to threaten an avowed homosexual with revelation of his sex life.

Homosexuals are also bad for morale, the military says. The unfortunate "straight" servicemen are forced to work with someone who may consider them sexually. The next logical step would thus seem to be to prohibit male and females from working together — unless they could prove they were gay.

It is also discouraging to have to work with someone you inherently dislike, and the typical American soldier detests "faggots," we are told. This argument sounds vaguely familiar. It wasn't so long ago that "this (white) man's army" began integrating blacks into the service, over much the same objection. Women, previously considered incompatible with service, also overcame similar complaints. Social change and acceptance can never be achieved if there is no first step.

The U.S. Army also says the presence of a homosexual is unfair to straight servicemen who have to sleep, shower, etc. in conditions affording minimal privacy. They don't want to be approached or bothered by leering homosexuals. This is obviously a gross generalization, and a stereotypical one at that. (We all know that homosexuals have irrepressible sexual appetites, right?)

No one should be subjected to unwanted sexual advances, whether homosexual or heterosexual. A person who makes uninvited homosexual passes should be disciplined — as should a heterosexual who commits the same offense.

It is unlikely the military can come up with a legitimate reason for barring homosexuals from service, because there isn't one. The military exists in its own world, with its own rules. In the civilian government, anti-discrimination laws and common sense are eliminating overt discrimination of persons because of their sexual preference. The military, however, is untouchable. Not only can it practice such overt discrimination, it can force institutions to bend their own anti-discrimination rules to suit the military. In 1982, the Department of Defense threatened to withhold valuable defense contracts from some eastern universities who refused to allow military recruiting on campus because of the military's discrimination against homosexuals.

It will ultimately be in the hands of the courts to stop the military's discrimination. Three of the eight Fort Leavenworth women have decided to fight their dismissals, so this may become an opportunity to change the antiquated and discriminatory practices of the military, and to ensure equal observance of individual liberties.

Horses die after business fails

The business venture in Marlin, Texas, that endeavored to corner the market on horse trading succeeded instead in starving hundreds of horses to death and disgracing Falls County residents.

Horses Unlimited, launched in September 1982 by Roy Plunkett, a horse trader, and Roland Jones Jr., a bank president, offered to sell farmers horses and pay $1 a day for feeding and upkeep. The horses would be bought back from the farmers according to market demand. The company expected not only huge profits from selling horses for riding and working purposes as well as meat, but ultimately desired to influence the price of all horseflesh.

The lush pastures of Falls County, in central Texas, became sustenance for about 15,000 horses. Horses Unlimited was supported by prominent cattlemen and ranchers and generated business — horses were sold to people from all over Texas. Up to 2,000 horses were shipped from Texas to slaughterhouses around the world.

But last month the company folded, suddenly announcing it would not honor its contracts to buy the horses back. More than a dozen Texas ranchers faced financial ruin. But the real victims in this failed scheme were innocent: 1,200 to 2,000 horses.

The horses had been crowded onto inadquate pastures by ranchers zealous to increase profits by increasing numbers, a situation complicated by a freeze this winter that destroyed much of the available forage.

Ranchers involved in Horses Unlimited, however, say no animals were purposely mistreated or allowed to starve. They claimed they were as much victims of the scheme as the horses.

But animal protection groups have had to answer questions as to why they neglected to challenge the scheme after several reports were made last year of its practices.

And Falls County residents apparently overlooked the consequences in anticipation of the financial force it would guarantee the county.

That such a tragedy occurred is indicative of both greed and apathy on the part of some Texans. Cruelty to animals is an expression of an inherent attitude of disregard for decency, civility and sensitivity. But shame and embarrassment now on the part of those involved in Horses Unlimited is not enough of a reprimand for such a calamity. A society that is truly concerned with justice for all should recognize that the roots that foster cruelty to animals harbor greater ills as well, and should be dealt with comparably.

Biology course is unique, efficient, basic

Editor,
Re: Sheila Eppard's column, "Biology course needs improvement," in the Jan. 31 Collegian.

The author felt that the class was confusing and failed to teach students "what they need to know." I disagree.

Principles of Biology is a unique course — and for a reason. The A.T. section consists of listening to a tape-recorded lecture and following instructions regarding a wide array of practical laboratories, with graduate students available to answer any questions. There is no single person with the sole responsibility of telling students what to do.

Granted, this can be understandably confusing on the first day, requiring a small amount of time to get the hang of it. Then the confusion should be gone. It's simple. The lecturer outlines what you are to do, aided by a printed module outline and a simple map of the room to abate confusion.

Principles of Biology has no lecture classes in the formal sense. Nobody is standing up front, providing a focus, and writing things on the chalkboard to be blindly copied down by students, then later scanned before a test for familiarity with the subject. Nobody is spoon-fed in the class. A student must work at his own pace. Further, the lecture can be turned on, off and reviewed at will. There are no lecture classes because they are less efficient.

Regarding teaching what students need to know, Principles of Biology is unparalleled. In no other class have I learned so much information in one semester. In addition, I have not only used this knowledge in other biology courses, but in chemistry and physics classes as well. This is why Principles of Biology is unique and requires greater efficiency — it covers a lot of information thoroughly.

Van Zile:

A hall in transition

By GREG PROSKE
Collegian Reporter

Van Zile Hall will be empty next year.

The Department of Housing sent letters to hall residents Jan. 25 informing them that the residence hall will be closed for renovation after this academic year.

"Our hope is that we'll have everything finished and have the hall open again by fall of 1985," Rosanne Proite, assistant director of housing, said. "We don't believe the building could function for much longer without the repairs."

During the past four years, rumors have been spread among the residents about the hall being closed for renovations, but each year Van Zile has remained open.

"Everything kind of came together at this time. The Board of Regents approved spending the money," Proite said.

Van Zile was built in 1926 and is the oldest residence hall in the state. The hall has never been renovated.

Approximate cost for the renovation will be $800,000, Proite said.

"The majority of the money will be spent on replacing the entire mechanical system, generators and all of the wiring," she said. She said Van Zile will comply with fire code standards by enclosing the stairwells and putting a sprinkler system in the basement.

Electric heating and air conditioning also will be added, Proite said. Ekdahl, Davis, Depew, Persson Architects, P.A., is the architectural firm commissioned to do the remodeling, she said.

"We have a tentative plan to wire each room so a phone could be put in. We also will have an intercom system for general communication, and we'll be putting in phone booths on each floor," Proite said.

Eight new rooms will be added to the first floor, and the floor and lavatories will be made accessible to handicapped persons.

"None of this is sketched in stone. Changes in the current plan could still be made," Proite said.

When the hall reopens, it will no longer have a food service of its own, Proite said.

"It's no longer cost efficient, and we thought we needed more living space for the residents. No plans have been made as to where the residents will eat meals," she said. Proite also said the hall may not be co-ed when it reopens.

"We (the housing department) haven't thought about what to make it yet. We could do anything we wanted with it. We haven't considered changing it. Right now we're concerned with the current residents, not as much with the future ones," she said.

Current residents who move back into the hall after it reopens will still enjoy some of the hall's familiar comforts.

"We are going to make a list of things we want to keep, such as the grandfather clock, the piano and the pool table," said Terry Ecklund, Van Zile hall president and senior in computer science.

Van Zile residents have differing opinions concerning the hall's closing.

"I don't like having to stay out a year, because Van Zile is my favorite hall," said Steve Mehl, freshman in business administration.

Steve Sutterlin, freshman in pre-design professions, said, "I like it the way it is."

"It's a shame to see the unity go, but the place needs work," said Connie Leach, junior in recreation/business management.

Other residents voiced their concern over the hall's closing, but said if it had to be done, it "might as well be now."

The department is concerned about the status of the community within the hall, Proite said. "We'll try to accommodate those residents who wish to stay together."

The department is working with Ecklund to find out how it may be able to help the transfer of Van Zile residents to other halls.

"Rosanne told me that if I got a list of names of people who want to live together — 10 to 15 — they (the housing department) would do all they could to accommodate them in another hall," Ecklund said.

"As long as the request is turned in early enough, those who want to can live together," he said.

Those who wish to live together in another hall must write a letter expressing that desire and deliver it to either Ecklund or Rick Arbutnot, Van Zile director and graduate in political science, who will submit the list to the housing department Feb. 15.

Van Zile residents relax in the lounge near the entryway of the 58-year-old hall. Most residents say they believe that renovation of the hall is necessary.

ABOVE: The dining hall will be closed after renovation, and it hasn't been determined where residents will eat. FAR RIGHT: The pool table will be returned for Van Zile residents like Jeff Borland, senior in mechanical engineering, to enjoy. RIGHT: Exposed pipes that hang from the ceiling of the basement will be enclosed by a false ceiling.

Stephan may file suit in water war

WICHITA — The state should ask the U.S. Supreme Court to force Colorado to stop holding back water from the Arkansas River, Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan said Wednesday.

Stephan said in an interview he has little hope of reaching a settlement with Colorado and that preliminary engineering reports have convinced him there is economic justification for a lawsuit.

"So everything I'm doing is preparing for a lawsuit. But if they give in, there will be no lawsuit," Stephan said.

Stephan estimated the cost of a court battle at more than $1 million and said the decision will be up to the Kansas Legislature. He said he would ask the Legislature later this month for money to begin the legal fight.

Kansas and Colorado have been fighting over water rights since the turn of the century, but a truce followed a 1948 agreement giving Kansas 40 percent of the water entering the Arkansas River in Colorado.

Kansas officials contend Colorado is violating the agreement by holding back water that should be released for irrigation use by Kansas farmers. The Colorado Attorney General's office has said there is no evidence to indicate there has been a violation of the agreement.

Assistant Attorney General Bill Paddock of Colorado said his state had declined to negotiate further until Kansas furnished information to substantiate its claims. But he said it was his understanding Stephan would continue negotiations once the consulting engineers gathered information to support the Kansas claim.

Jury rules against former firefighter

IOWA CITY, Iowa — A jury on Thursday ruled against a former firefighter who sued the city for sex discrimination, claiming her civil rights were violated by male co-workers who harassed her after she breast-fed her son at work.

The Johnson County District Court jury of five men and three women began deliberations Wednesday in the suit filed by Linda Eaton.

Eaton, 31, was not present when the jury announced its decision. She had sought $950,000 from the city and three city officials.

Trial for Nebraska murder ends

NEBRASKA CITY, Neb. — The four-day first-degree murder trial of Nicodemus J. Honeycutt came to an end early Thursday when he pleaded guilty to second-degree murder in connection with the 1983 death of Vance Moller of Nebraska City.

Moller's body was found Sept. 14, 1983 under a viaduct in Nebraska City.

Honeycutt, 39, of Joplin, Mo., sat silent as Judge Raymond J. Case asked him if he understood the action he was taking. "Yes, sir," Honeycutt answered in a quiet voice.

Authorities said Moller died as a result of several blows to the face with a blunt object.

Honeycutt was arrested in Joplin on Sept. 22, 1983. He waived extradition and was returned to Nebraska Sept. 28, 1983.

Honeycutt told his attorney at 9 a.m. Thursday that he wanted to plead guilty to second-degree murder. Judge Case accepted the plea and sent the case to a probation officer for pre-sentence investigation.

The prosecution had based its case on property stolen from Moller that authorities claim was traced back to Honeycutt.

Bond was set at 10 percent of $500,000.

Universities compare fee procedures

By DAVID BEVENS
Staff Writer

K-State and the University of Kansas currently use a student registration procedure similar to the University of Iowa. Neither Kansas school, however, has adopted the IU fee payment procedure involving a central accounts receivable which allows delayed fee payment.

"We have taken a lot of the process from that system. However, one thing we have not taken is delayed fee payment," Don Foster, University registrar, said.

Delayed fee payment allows students to pay their fees after classes begin, he said.

IU students pay tuition and other fees using a credit card that also serves as their identification card. Students are billed periodically.

"What the University of Iowa has, and what a lot of institutions have, is a central accounts receivable. What an accounts receivable does is accumulates all the bills," Foster said. Student convenience would be the advantage of such a system, he said.

An alternative method is mail-in fee payment. This method would be particularly beneficial to students employed during semester breaks.

"I think the big advantage of mail-in fee payment is that the students don't have to come back to school until class (begins)," Foster said. "For a lot of students, that amounts to a fairly large amount of money."

Foster said mail-in fee payment at K-State would benefit the administration as well as students. The University could avoid the inconvenience of setting up tables in Ahearn Field House, where fee payment currently is held. The size of the student body would also be known before classes begin, he said.

"In terms of expense, this system is really probably the cheapest way to do this," he said of the present method.

The registrar's office and the comptroller's office work together over the two-day fee payment period at the beginning of each semester. Together they employ an additional 100 people. The registrar's office, which employs about 65 students during the fee payment period, spends $3,000 each semester in wages, Foster said.

Not everyone in Anderson Hall favors a mail-in fee payment and centralized accounts receivable.

"I don't have an opinion of mail-in fee payment per se. I just know how it would effect us on the business side where it is our responsibility to collect the tuition and fees and be responsible for those," Daniel Beatty, vice president of business affairs, said.

The lack of money and space impedes the implementation of a mail-in fee payment procedure and a central accounts receivable at K-State, he said.

"For us, as we see it, we have limited office space here at the University, and we have limited budget. As for our estimates, the least cost for collecting fees would be at the two-day registration of the students," Beatty said. To equip and hire office personnel would cost the University $80,000 to $100,000 a year, he said.

The money for such an operation would have to come from a fund consisting of student tuition and state funding. The state funding is based on the number of credit hours on the undergraduate and graduate levels. Currently, K-State credit hours are on a decline, he said.

"If we lose student semester credit hours, we get a cut. Then on top of that, we got a $3.2 million cut on base," Beatty said. The multi-million dollar reduction in the base was a result of state budget cuts, he said.

"We get new funds from increases in tuition," under these circumstances, Beatty said. Employees could be moved from current positions within administrative departments to fill the personnel void of implementing a central accounts receivable, but "painfully," he said.

"We're probably about in the same boat," said Gary Thompson, director of student records at KU, in reference to the financial situation there. The university is also planning future modifications of its fee collection procedure, but not for a couple of years, he said.

KU conducts a registration and fee payment procedure similar to K-State. Although Thompson said he doesn't know what changes will be made, he said he doubts either KU or K-State will have a system as "encompassing" as IU.

"I really would be surprised," he said.

Judge sentences Klansman to electric chair in Alabama

By The Associated Press

MOBILE, Ala. — A circuit judge, breaking Alabama precedent, overruled his jury Thursday and sentenced a Ku Klux Klansman to death in the electric chair for killing a young black man and hanging the body from a camphor tree.

Judge Braxton Kittrell Jr. set an April 30 execution date for Henry Francis Hays, who according to testimony killed 19-year-old Michael Donald at random "to show Klan strength in Alabama."

District Attorney Chris Galanos had called the case a "crime of racial hatred" and urged Kittrell to impose the death penalty despite conflicting Alabama case law.

A jury of 11 whites and one black convicted Hays of capital murder on Dec. 20 and recommended a sentence of life in prison without possibility of parole.

At the time of the killing, on March 21, 1961, the state death penalty law prohibited a judge from increasing a sentence to death if a jury recommended life.

The law was changed later in 1961, but Ed Carnes, assistant Alabama attorney general, has said the earlier statute applied in the Hays case.

"Judge Kittrell set a precedent. I hope it sticks," said Galanos.

Opera successfully overrides obstacles

By ANGIE SCHARNHORST
Arts and Entertainment Editor

It may have once been said the Giacomo Puccini's "La Boheme" is an ideal introduction to opera for the indoctrinated. The New York City Opera National Company's performance of the opera in McCain Auditorium last night, however, was not an indication of that.

Not that the performance wasn't extremely well orchestrated, well performed, well staged or well directed — it was — but several obstacles in the delivery of the performance could easily have scared away someone being introduced to opera for the first time.

The performance started 10 minutes late, and three 20-minute intermissions between the opera's four acts made the performance seem endless.

Those who were willing to ignore those obstacles were treated to an evening of fine musicianship, however.

The opera chronicled the lives of four young artists on Paris' west bank in the early 19th century, and starred David Parsons, Michael Sylvester, Young Mi Kim and Sandra Ruggles.

Kim was superlative as a dying woman who falls in love with the bohemian poet Rodolfo, portrayed by Sylvester. Her fine soprano voice was the best in the performance. It was almost matched in quality by Parsons', who played a friend of the two lovers. During the third act, Parsons and Kim shared a duet, one of the most breathtaking sequences of the performance.

The opera began rather slowly, but steadily grew more tragic, more amusing and more captivating as the story began to unfold. The performers adequately portrayed the hilarity and pathos of the bohemians' lifestyles.

Some of the highlights of the performance included the duets between Mimi (Kim), and her lover

Rodolfo. The initial meeting of the two, in the bohemians' apartment, set the scene for a beautiful aria. Though Parsons' vocal quality outshone Sylvester's, the blend between his voice and Kim's was unsurpassed. This was proven again in the end of the first of the four acts, when the two characters declared their love for each other.

The most memorable part of "La Boheme" was the final scene. As Mimi slowly died, Sylvester and Kim shared the final vocal of the opera. The touching duet between the two served to depress the audience, although moments before they were laughing.

Almost without exception, the vocal talent displayed by the company was extraordinary. Unfortunately, in portions of the opera the performers were overshadowed by the orchestra, which should have been accompanying them. The company's orchestra was also exceptionally talented, but due to some quirk in McCain's acoustics or some other unrecognizable factor, the orchestra was occasionally so overbearing that the true talent of the singers could not be appreciated.

When the balance between vocals and accompaniment was correct, the orchestra performed as well as could be expected from a professional company such as this. One strong point of the orchestra was its horn section, which added particular joy to the scenes of the bohemians' merriment.

The stage scenery and props were also as professional as would be expected by such a fine company as the New York City Opera National Company. Every detail was accounted for in elaborate sets, which accurately portrayed the starkness of the apartment and the richness of a Parisian cafe.

The staging of the opera was also complete to the finest detail. As the bohemians shared Christmas dinner in a cafe, shoppers could be seen in the street outside buying last-minute gifts. Even snowflakes, which in many stage productions look like giant pieces of shredded paper, looked somewhat realistic.

If the many delays in the presentation of "La Boheme" were overlooked, the production was overwhelming. The performers were of a rare caliber, and were well supported by a talented, albeit overbearing, orchestra.

Trips abroad provide inspiration for artist

At least once during the course of a lifetime, nearly everyone dreams of putting reality on hold and traveling to far-off lands, to explore diverse terrains and mystical antiquities. Keith Achepohl, professor of art at the University of Iowa in Iowa City, made this dream come true.

Achepohl, who presented a lecture and slide show Thursday night in the Union Little Theater, ventured abroad and used his experiences as inspiration in his work.

The lecture was sponsored by the Union Program Council Arts Committee and the K-State Department of Art.

In 1977, Achepohl decided to put university life aside again and traveled to Europe on sabbatical leave. He traveled through parts of Europe, then headed to Egypt.

"In Egypt, I encountered many striking and beautiful sights. I found the contrast between the man-made and the natural to be very inspiring," Achepohl said.

The antiquities of Egypt provided Achepohl with new ideas for his watercolor paintings. The ruins of the ancient temples in Luxor and the striking dimensions of Abu Simbel, a monument situated in the Aswan Dam area, were inspirations, he said.

"The shape of the temples, the contrasting shadows, the great doorways and the colorful hieroglyphics all provided me with new ideas and approaches for my watercolors," Achepohl said.

Achepohl's work has also been influenced by his favorite painter, Piero Della Francesca.

"I admire his sense of absolute accountability — he (Francesca) is able to capture everything that he sees in his work," Achepohl said.

"I'm working on several paintings right now. Sometimes I just have to leave them for a while. I have to let them talk to me — it's an ongoing dialogue with me and the work," Achepohl said.

Today is the last day that Achepohl's display of watercolors and prints, many of which were inspired by his trip to Egypt, will be on display in the K-State Union Art Gallery. The gallery is open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

UPC to implement policies regarding unruliness at films

Due to increased problems with unruly customers, the Union Program Council films committees plan to take action to prevent alcohol from being brought into Union Forum Hall or Little Theatre while midnight movies are being shown.

"We feel this is a problem to be dealt with. It has gotten much worse this semester," said Barbara Burke, UPC's adviser in charge of the committees.

"We want the people to have a good time, but it's against our policy and it's against the law for them to bring in alcohol," she said.

The committees plan to implement four steps to alleviate the problem.

"We'll have four people working and checking student ID cards," she said, concerning one of the steps to be taken.

A sign will be posted by the theater doors, stating that no food or beverages of any kind are permitted in Forum Hall. It will also say that failure to comply with those rules may result in the removal of those who disregard them.

Theater personnel will check belongings and large pockets of people at the theater doors, and four attendants will watch the aisles in the theater while the movie is being shown, she said.

"Those drinking will be escorted to the door," she said.

She said the committees' major concern is keeping the theater clean, since it is used for other functions as well as films.

"The crowds will have to obey the policies or we may have to stop showing midnight movies, because we can't control the situation," Mike Hatch, Union program director, said.

Jazz musician to perform, teach

Improvisation cues pianist's success

By ANGIE SCHARNHORST
Arts and Entertainment Editor

Marion McPartland leads jazz workshops the same way she plays her music. She improvises.

McPartland, who has been termed "the first lady of jazz," will display her improvisational talent — in her workshops and on stage — Feb. 10 as part of the Central States Jazz Festival in McCain Auditorium.

"I guess I (teach my clinics) pretty much as I play music — improvising to a great extent," British-born McPartland said in a telephone interview from Freeport, N.Y. "They aren't cut and dried. I have to teach at different levels.

"I'm sure (at K-State) students are high-leveled and sophisticated."

One of the most important things McPartland said she tries to teach in her improvised workshops is just that, the art of improvisation.

"I try to show them how to get the most out of a tune and give them ideas for improvising," she said. "These are things you really have to do when you are in the business. You have to learn a lot about improvising."

McPartland, who is considered one of the greatest keyboard artists in the world of jazz, solicits active participation as a means of instructing the members of her clinics.

"I like to hit some of them up to play," she said. "It's great if someone will get up and play a little bit with me, but I hate to put them on the spot."

McPartland's clinic will be held at 1 p.m. on Feb. 10 in McCain Auditorium.

McPartland studied at the Guildhall School of Music in London as a classical pianist, but much preferred jazz. She left the Guildhall to join a four-piano touring act in vaudeville, eventually joining the USO during World War II. In 1950 she opened with her own group in New York. She later began to branch out further, and in the 1960s a disc jockey friend got her started doing workshops for elementary school children. Her university clinics evolved from those.

While doing her first grade school clinic, McPartland said she discovered that there was a need for jazz education. Although many of the students were unfamiliar with jazz as a musical form, she kept them entertained.

"I guess (my elementary school workshops) were better than arithmetic," she said. "After I finished playing, I asked them what they wanted to hear, and someone yelled out 'You Ain't Nothin' But a Hound Dog.' One has to show them that there is something else."

McPartland said she often encounters black students who are unaware of the contributions of black jazz artists to music.

"Some of them have never heard of (Duke) Ellington," she said. "That is sad. There are no black heroes in music today, only sports. It's fun trying to turn them around a little bit."

Beginning university workshops required a slightly different approach, McPartland said.

"I really had to start from scratch to find out what university students needed," she said. "They go through phases. I try to inspire them and show them the way to go."

The marks of a good performer are motivation, curiosity and insistence, McPartland said.

"Motivation is important," she said. "Talent can lie fallow, lie dormant without motivation."

McPartland said she has encountered young musicians who are just discovering some of the jazz classics, and it is interesting to watch their enthusiasm.

"I have a lot of young musicians working with me," she said. "One came in very excited because he had just heard 'Don't Look Now,' a classic jazz piece. It's funny that they are just now discovering these things."

She is currently touring with young Chicago bassist Larry Gray, with whom she will perform a duo concert in McCain.

She said she has noticed an upswing in interest in jazz music in younger musical audiences.

"I don't know how or why the renewed interest in jazz is happening," she said. "People have grown up on rock and are looking for something different. They are curious about other things. The caliber of rock musicians is rarely as high as jazz musicians."

"Usually in college towns people think Keith Jarrett is great," McPartland said. "He uses solo piano, which is a great thing. I think they're all getting turned on to Bill Evans. It is sad that he is dead, but that's the way it often happens."

McPartland uses several other means to inform the public about jazz, including articles and a weekly, syndicated radio show.

She has written articles on the subject for "Esquire's World of Jazz," and various newspapers and magazines. She is currently at work on a book about women jazz musicians, something that she said is very important to her.

Originally, she said, she planned the book to be a biography of women jazz artists, but because two similar books have recently been printed, she has changed her perspective.

"The book is probably going to get done in another way — how great women jazz musicians have come into my life. None of my research will be lost," she said.

McPartland also produces a radio show for National Public Radio. On "Piano Jazz," carried in Manhattan at 2 p.m. on Wednesdays on KSAC, she interviews major pianists weekly.

"We exchange ideas and do solos and duets," she said.

McPartland usually participates in the Midwestern showcase of women's jazz, The Kansas City Women's Jazz Festival. The festival began in 1978 and has continued annually since that time, but has apparently been cancelled for 1984 due to financial reasons.

"I don't know why they're not doing it this year. I just know they're not having it. I count myself lucky to have been involved," said McPartland, who contributed to the festival for four years. "It was a great thing. Maybe they'll get it together and have it again next year. That's something that won't disappear, I hope."

Dancers to showcase original performances

By DENISE WILLSON
Collegian Reporter

Members of the Susan Warden Dancers Inc. will showcase their individual works in their annual winter concert at 3 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

"This is very unique to the Susan Warden Dancers," Marty Cohen, company manager, said. "Usually they do Susan Warden works."

Each of the eight dancers will explore new ideas with space, time and their own idea of movement, Cohen said.

"There will be a real variety of pieces," he said. "It won't be traditional dance in the sense that ballet is traditional dance."

Letting the dancers perform their own works makes them enjoy the company more, Cohen said.

"They can grow artistically and work better together," he said. "It lets them know their work is as important as Susan's."

Members also will perform a group-improvisation dance.

"The dancers spontaneously develop a theme and then vary it," Cohen said. "The exciting thing about it is you never know what is going to happen."

During this time, the audience is also given the opportunity to see how dance and movement is developed, he said.

Warden, artistic director of the company and one of the dancers, will be performing in two of the pieces, one of which is a works-in-progress called "Great Voices."

The second piece is called "Trio," and unlike "Great Voices," has been completed. "Trio" will be performed in four sections. The first is a women's section with three dancers, the second is a sextet with four women and two men, the third is a three-man section and the fourth features the entire company.

The concert will include informal presentations, during which Warden will explain the content of the dance before the audience views it.

Begun in 1979, the company is composed of professional dancers who rehearse 40 hours a week. The Susan Warden dancers perform a full concert season, including fall, winter and spring concerts.

Each spring Cohen and Warden give the dancers the option of staying with the company another season, which runs from August through May. Auditions will be held in March and April to add one or two more dancers.

Last season the company performed in South Dakota, Wisconsin, Missouri and Oklahoma.

This season's final performance will be May 4 in McCain Auditorium.

K-State to meet Nebraska

The K-State men's basketball team will be looking for its second Big Eight Conference victory as they host the University of Nebraska Cornhuskers Saturday. The game is scheduled for 4:10 p.m. at Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats defeated Iowa State University, 75-69, Wednesday evening for their first conference victory of the season. The victory improved the 'Cats' overall record to 9-9 and their conference record to 1-4.

Sophomore Jonas Cody, replacing Eric Watson in the starting lineup, responded with a career high 20 points. Cody hit 8 of 12 shots from the field and 4 of 7 free throws.

Eddie Elder added 24 points and 11 rebounds, while Ben Mitchell scored 18, as K-State held off a furious Cyclone rally to hang on for the victory.

K-State Coach Jack Hartman said he was happy with the Wildcats' performance.

"The season isn't over," he said. "Hey, we played three of our four games on the road with a young team."

The Cornhuskers come to Ahearn following a 54-52 overtime victory over Oklahoma State University. The 'Huskers held the ball until, with 12 seconds in the overtime remaining, David Ponce drove from the top of the baseline and scored on a 5-foot basket at the buzzer to give Nebraska the victory.

The Cornhuskers are now 2-3 in the Big Eight and 12-6 overall.

Nebraska is led by 6-foot-11 sophomore Dave Hoppen, who leads the 'Huskers in scoring with a 19.8 per game scoring average. He also leads in rebounding with an average of seven boards per game. Hoppen scored 23 points in the victory over the Cowboys — the only Nebraska player in double figures.

Senior forward Stan Cloudy averages 13.3 points per outing and 6.6 rebounds per game.

"Hoppen and Cloudy are two of the better players in the league," Hartman said. "We definitely have to stop them in order to win."

Elsewhere in Saturday's Big Eight action, the University of Missouri travels to Norman to meet the University of Oklahoma and Iowa State hosts Oklahoma State.

On Sunday, Wichita State University meets the University of Kansas in Allen Field House in a non-conference game.

Staff/Jeff Taylor

Wildcat guard Jonas Cody, who responded with a career-high 20 points in his first starting role for the 'Cats, will lead the team into Saturday's 4:10 p.m. tip off with the Nebraska Cornhuskers in Ahearn Field House.

'Cats face Shockers in track dual

K-State's men's and women's track teams will host a dual indoor meet with Wichita State University on Sunday at Ahearn Field House.

The meet is scheduled to begin at 10 a.m. with the field events. The running events will follow, beginning at 2 p.m.

The purpose of the meet is to prepare the squads for upcoming competition, especially for tough meets next week in Illinois, Steve Miller, head track coach, said.

"We're very anxious to have good performances at Illinois, so this meet will warm us up for that," Miller said.

Sunday's home meet is one of the six home meets that are scheduled during both the indoor and outdoor season this year.

"We've been having more and more success each year, and we'd like to give people here a chance to see us perform," Miller said.

The meet was originally planned to be a quadrangular, but teams from Southwest Missouri State, Nebraska and Northwest Missouri State chose not to attend.

On Jan. 28 the squads traveled to Columbia, Mo., for the Missouri men's triangular and the women's five-way meet. Four athletes had national qualifying performances.

Jacque Struckhoff qualified for nationals with a 10:06.09 time in the two-mile run. She not only qualified for nationals, but also set a new school record. The old record was 10:13.6, set by Deb Pihl in 1983.

In the shot put competition, Pinkie Suggs threw a qualifying mark of 49½ feet. Pihl finished the 1000-yard run with a time of 2:31.95, earning a trip to nationals.

In the men's competition, Ken Harrison leaped 51-feet-10 to qualify for nationals in the triple jump. But Miller said that because of an injury, Harrison will be out until at least the Big Eight tournament on February 24-25 or could be red-shirted for the indoor season.

Miller said the squads' training is going extremely well, and the early performances indicate that the teams are further along than they have been in the past several seasons.

Sports psychologists help athletes

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — In practice, U.S. skier John Buxman's slalom runs are smooth and sharp. In races, he falls a lot and finishes infrequently.

"He has a continuing thought of a fear of falling," said Dr. Barbara Kolonay, a sports psychologist who is working as a feature commentator for ABC during the Winter Olympics.

Buxman uses Dr. Jerry May, a clinical psychologist, to better reach his potential. Ski jumper Mike Holland and figure skater Rosalynn Summers also work with psychologists to improve their skills.

Their use of sports psychology is not unique in the world of Olympic athletes.

Russian athletes have used it for 50 years, Kolonay said, but the United States began serious study just 10 years ago — perhaps one of the reasons ABC is using a psychologist for the first time as part of its Winter Olympic coverage.

The word psychology should not frighten anyone, she said. "It does not imply sickness," Kolonay said. "Rather, the use of it is simply an attempt to get people to perform better, to make the best use of their skills" by controlling fears and facing reality.

"My feeling is that everyone needs this," she said. "The idea is to have control of your physical skills."

Kolonay, a native of Trafford, Pa., with a doctorate in sports psychology from Tulane University, has worked with several college and professional basketball teams to help them improve their skills.

Truck Robinson, a forward with the New York Knicks, carries a cassette that Kolonay personally made to help him cope with tension. "His tension was so severe he couldn't feel a ball in his hands," she said.

Robinson was with the Phoenix Suns when Kolonay worked with the team to improve its foul shooting. Using relaxation techniques and imagery rehearsal, Robinson improved his foul shooting from the 60 percents to the 70 percents.

May and Dr. Ranier Maratins, a psychologist with the United States' cross country and nordic teams, will arrive in Sarajevo sometime later, but Kolonay said their tasks are over for the moment.

"Now it is a matter of applying the training. No athlete is going to change at this point," said Kolonay, who is making her network TV debut with the six-part series, "Inner Game."

Martins also uses cognitive restructuring — a process, Kolonay said, that tries to cause an athlete to change his thinking "from 'I'll die if I don't win the gold medal' to 'It'll be unfortunate if I don't win the gold medal, but I'll get through it.'"

Martins helps athletes set up short-term goals that lead to long-term goals.

"It's just not reality to say you want to be a 90-meter ski jumper.

But if you start with small jumps and you succeed and you build your confidence up by succeeding, you may reach that long-range goal," Kolonay said.

Sororities obey anti-discrimination policies at University of Arkansas

By College Press Service

FAYETTEVILLE, ARK. — Eight University of Arkansas sororities finally have signed a pledge to abide by the school's anti-discrimination rules, but not before they were threatened with losing all their on-campus privileges if they persisted in not signing the pledge.

The sororities — Alpha Delta Pi, Chi Omega, Delta Delta Delta, Delta Gamma, Kappa Alpha Theta, Phi Mu, Pi Beta Phi and Zeta Tau Alpha — refused to sign Arkansas' affirmative action pledge on the advice of their national chapters.

"It really was a national issue, not a local one," UA Vice Chancellor Lyle Gohn, said.

"I imagine that some lawyer somewhere took a look (at the policy statement, which all campus organizations are required to sign), and got excited," said Barb Taylor, UA's director of human relations.

"We're open to anybody as long as they meet our qualifications," said Jimna Barnett, ADPi president.

Asked if the house had any minority members, Barnett said, "Sure, we've had a few Mexican girls, or whatever you call them."

The problem, she said, was that the university "wouldn't define affirmative action." The vagueness of the policy made sororities fear they were obligating themselves to establishing racial quotas.

Taylor said the national chapters — none of them would respond to reporters' questions — worried the affirmative action policy would inhibit the house members' freedom of association.

Failing to sign the policy, however, did inhibit the houses' movements.

Under school rules, groups that don't sign the affirmative action pledge cannot be in university publications, use UA's name, participate in student government or enjoy any of the prerogatives student group recognition brings.

The eight sororities finally signed the pledge on Jan. 13.

There are 12 sororities in all on the campus. Three are all-black, nine all-white, university spokesman, Dave Edmark, said.

In general, minority student participation in Arkansas' greek system is minimal, said Ralph Johnson, Greek Life Coordinator. "One black woman did participate in rush," he recalled, "but dropped out of her own accord."

Voluntary segregation has been but one obstacle to racial harmony among houses nationwide.

It took a year of administrative and student group threats to force 17 sororities at the University of Texas to sign an anti-discrimination pledge there in 1981.

But a series of minority student complaints has moved houses at Michigan State University, University of Minnesota and University of North Carolina, among other campuses, to try to make peace over the last year.

At the University of Maryland, black fraternities and sororities rejoined the Intrafraternity Council they angrily left in 1978 after a mix-up over a budgeting problem.

At UA, the problem was being "assured of our rights as a private organization," Barnett said. But now that the sororities have signed the pledge, "it's not changing anything here."

Duane Acker has committed $200,000 per year to Farrell for the next four years. Part of that money would go to pay library staff so hours could be expanded, she said.

Turner said Gov. John Carlin has recommended $240,000 for Farrell in his budget request to the Legislature.

A student body president should be "realistic" and try to work with the administration rather than demanding certain policies, Turner said, referring to hours and areas of Farrell which should be available to students.

Hawkins said she thinks the most important issue of the election is to make sure the candidate elected truly represents the student body.

Hawkins said she would improve communication with students by writing a bi-monthly column for the Collegian and starting a bi-monthly call-in program at KSDB-FM with herself, the Student Senate chairman and another "expert" in the topic of discussion.

Hawkins also said she would try to establish better relations with the Manhattan City Commission. Two seats on the commission will be available in April, 1985, and she said she would check into the possibility of having a student elected to the position, she said.

Heinz said he would pursue the idea of implementing better lighting on campus. He said all lighting needs cannot be met right away, but at least the process could be started.

University Facilities has said they do not have any money for lighting, Heinz said. But the K-State Alumni Association has money for senior class gifts, he said.

Turner closed the forum by noting that students need to beware of phrases such as "needs looked into," and "check the possibility of." Students need to press the candidates to find out just what they will do about issues and problems, Turner said.

Both Shultz and Ortega were here for the inauguration Thursday of President Jaime Lusinchi.

In Washington, Henry Kissinger also said through a spokesman, Herb Hetu, that the charge of recommending an invasion was false.

"I never made such a recommendation, nor was I asked to make a recommendation on that subject," Kissinger said. "It is a lie."

Shultz's comments came as the Reagan administration prepares to request a major increase in military aid to friendly nations in Central America, particularly El Salvador, which is fighting a four-year war against leftist guerrillas.

Income tax preparation tips describe deductions

(Editor's note: This is the last of a two-part listing of income tax preparation tips. They were written by Beta Alpha Psi, an accounting fraternity. While based on factual information, neither Beta Alpha Psi, the Collegian nor K-State can be responsible for any consequences that may arise. If further assistance is needed, consult a professional tax consultant.)

9. CERTAIN CIRCUMSTANCES allow the deduction of moving expenses when changing locations of employment. Expenses for travel, meals, lodging, shipping personal effects, house hunting trips, temporary living expenses and sale, lease or purchase of a residence are eligible.

The deduction is limited to $3,000, with various conditions for each type of expense. Reimbursement by an employer must be included as a part of gross income or a reduction of the deduction. Form 3903 has all the details.

10. IF YOUR INCOME this year was significantly higher than in previous years, you may be eligible for income averaging. This year's

Greek retreat aids leaders, trains officers

Ed King, director of residential life at Bradley University, will be the keynote speaker at the Greek Leaders' Retreat Saturday, Barb Robel, Greek affairs adviser, said.

King, a member of the Sigma Chi fraternity, will speak on "The Importance of Ritual" at 9 a.m. in the K-State Union Forum Hall. He has spoken at many Greek national conferences and leadership workshops.

In addition to his presentation, several workshops for officers in Greek houses will be conducted throughout the day in the Union, Robel said.

Sessions are scheduled for house presidents, vice presidents, Panhellenic representatives, treasurers, scholarship chairmen, social chairmen, house managers, pledge trainers, rush chairmen, alumni relations, community relations and chapter advisers.

income must be at least $3,000 or more than the average of the past four years' income to be eligible for this special provision.

Additional requirements of citizenship and support also apply. Pick up schedule G and instructions for full details.

11. THE IRS has increased the optional standard mileage rate for business use of an auto by 1 1/2 cent. For the first 15,000 miles, the rate is now 20.5 cents per mile. The rate for mileage in excess of 15,000 miles is unchanged at 11 cents per mile.

Also unchanged is the rate for charitable, medical and moving costs, which all remain at 9 cents per mile.

12. RESIDENTIAL ENERGY credits are available for a taxpayer's principal residence that was substantially completed before April 2, 1977. The energy conservation credit is 15 percent of the first $2,000 for storm windows, insulation, weather stripping, etc.

There is a maximum cumulative credit of $300 per residence. Expenses for renewable energy credit items such as solar, wind or geothermal energy equipment, solar roof panels, etc. qualify for 20 or 40 percent credit with the maximum cumulative credit of $4,000 per residence. Full instructions and limitations may be found in form 5905.

13. A DEDUCTION FOR PROPERTY losses due to fire, storm or theft is allowed as a casualty loss. For non-business property each loss is reduced by a $100 floor. The total of all these "adjusted" losses are combined, and the deduction is the amount of this total that exceeds 10 percent of adjusted gross income. Any insurance recovery reduces the amount of loss and must be claimed. Full instructions are on schedule A.

14. THE ALTERNATIVE minimum tax is a tax to ensure that an individual does not go totally tax-free due to certain tax write-offs known as tax preference items. Capital gains deduction, excess depreciation or depletion, all-savers interest and dividends are just some of the tax preference items. If you have tax preference items on your tax return, be sure you look at Form 6251.

15. A DEDUCTION FOR office-in-home expenses is allowed only if that portion of the home is used exclusively and on a regular basis as the taxpayer's principal place of business or meeting place with clients. Employees must prove that the home was also used for the convenience of the employer.

The deduction is limited to gross income generated in the home reduced by deductible taxes, interest and prorated utilities and depreciation. One note of caution: office-in-home expenses have historically been highly suspect by the IRS as abusive; therefore, you better be able to prove any office-in-home deductions.

Navy training is based on more than 1900 reactor-years of experience. Right now the Navy operates over half the nuclear reactors in America. And the Navy's nuclear equipment is the most sophisticated in the world. That's why your Navy training is and must be the most sophisticated in the world.

As an officer in the Nuclear Navy, you have decision-making authority immediately. You get important management responsibility fast. Because in the Navy, as your knowledge grows, so does your responsibility.

Your training and experience place you among the country's most qualified professionals. (No surprise that most of the men who operate the reactors in private industry started in the Nuclear Navy.)

It takes more time and more effort to become an officer in the Nuclear Navy. But the rewards are greater, too.

The rewards can begin as early as your junior year in college. Qualify, and the Navy will pay you approximately $1000/month while you finish school.

After four years, with regular promotions and salary increases, you can be earning as much as $40,500. That's on top of a benefits package that includes medical and dental care, and 30 days' vacation earned every year. More responsibility, more money, more future. So, if you're majoring in math, engineering or the physical sciences, and you want to know more about a future in nuclear power, fill in the coupon.

Challenger to launch twin of errant satellite

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — The Westar VI satellite that failed to get into a 22,300-mile-high orbit after being launched from the space shuttle Challenger was found Sunday, "completely healthy" but in the wrong orbit.

A ground station in California succeeded in changing the satellite's position so that its batteries could charge from the sun's energy, said Bill Ziegler, a spokesman for Western Union, which owns Westar VI.

Ziegler said, however, that there was no hope of raising the satellite to an orbit where it would be stationary above Earth. The most that can be hoped for is that "we might get a few hours twice a day," he said.

But Ziegler added, "in the parlance of cars, I think it's a total loss."

Meanwhile, the shuttle was dogged again by bad luck — this time by a burst balloon — but the government of Indonesia gave the go-ahead anyway for the launch of a second communications satellite, the twin of Westar VI.

"As far as we know, we have a spacecraft (satellite) that's in the wrong orbit that's completely healthy," Ziegler said.

He said there was "no evidence of any damage to the spacecraft" and that the failure apparently was in the rocket that was to carry it to geosynchronous orbit. The satellite had separated from the "Payload Assist Module," he said.

In early ground testing of the booster rocket, it had failed when a nozzle came apart, Ziegler said. Based on radar data, the failure in space is consistent with the one experienced during ground testing, he said.

During those tests, the nozzle on the PAM came apart and allowed the rocket plume to surround and overheat the rest of the engine, he said. This resulted in an undirected firing and eventually snuffed out the flame.

The orbit that Westar VI achieved and a second large object seen on radar would indicate such a failure, he said.

Despite Westar's errant orbit, the launch of the Indonesian communications satellite was set for Monday morning.

Commander Vance Brand was told of the decision just before he went to sleep after his third day in space.

"Sure glad to hear that," he said. "So were we," said mission control's Mary Cleave.

The second satellite was to have been ejected from the shuttle's cargo bay Saturday. But because of Westar's failure, the Indonesians debated whether to risk their expensive satellite when the problem was not understood. They had the option of having the satellite brought back when the shuttle lands next Saturday.

"Obviously, since we had a failure, I'm sure the pulses will be up at a higher rate than they would have been if we had a nominal Westar deploy," said flight director Randy Stone.

Westar VI, representing a $75 million investment by Western Union, was ejected from the shuttle's cargo bay Friday.

Meanwhile, a celestial game of cat and mouse with a 6-foot plastic balloon ended early Sunday before it began when the balloon exploded.

Lebanon's leaders submit resignations

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Prime Minister Shafik Wazzan and his eight-man Cabinet resigned Sunday, and President Amin Gemayel said he might scrap the May 17 troop withdrawal agreement with Israel as demanded by his opponents.

Wazzan, a Sunni Moslem, said he was stepping down to allow formation of a national coalition government that might help end Lebanon's factional bloodshed.

After accepting the resignations,

Gemayel, a Maronite Christian, called for a cease-fire and said he was inviting Lebanon's warring Moslem and Christian factions to Geneva for reconciliation talks Feb. 27.

"The agreement (with Israel) has put us in an embarrassing impasse that led me to refrain from ratifying it," Gemayel said in a speech broadcast on nationwide television. "I see it necessary to continue all efforts to find a formula that would guarantee the complete withdrawals (of foreign troops) from all Lebanese territories to safeguard Lebanon's independence and sovereignty."

A few minutes after his 15-minute speech, artillery shells and rockets could be heard crashing into Beirut's embattled southern suburbs.

Earlier, Shiite Moslem militiamen seized control of much of the road to the Beirut airport, where U.S. Marines are based, leaving the Lebanese army in control of a single checkpoint.

Twelve people were killed in heavy fighting Sunday between the army and the Shiite Amal militia at the Galerie Semaan crossing in Beirut. The toll from the four-day battle reached at least 70 slain and more than 250 wounded, police reported.

Gemayel accepted the resignation of the Cabinet the day after a top Shiite Moslem leader called on all Moslem ministers to resign from the government. Wazzan and three other Cabinet members are Moslems. Five are Christian.

U.S. Embassy loses contact with Salvadoran informants

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Embassy in El Salvador has lost two key sources of information about rightist military violence over the past three years, with one informant possibly murdered because of what he knew, administration officials say.

The officials said the loss of those sources — and not an intentional cover-up by the Reagan administration — has prevented action against Miami-based exiles allegedly tied to right-wing death squads or against rightist leader Roberto D'Aubuisson.

Last week, Robert E. White, former U.S. ambassador to El Salvador, accused the administration of concealing evidence implicating D'Aubuisson in the 1980 murder of that country's Roman Catholic archbishop. White also said the administration had done little with information on six wealthy

Alumni group to open Smith House next fall

By PHIL HOLLAND
Collegian Reporter

After being closed this academic year, the Maitland E. Smith Cooperative House will reopen its doors for the 1984 fall semester.

But although the house will reopen, it will not operate as it had during the past several years.

The name of the house will be changed back to Smith Scholarship House, and a new program has been formulated to help each resident reach his full potential, said David Boyd, temporary instructor of extension energy and former Smith resident.

The Smith Scholars Program will emphasize nine areas of personal development: academics, social activities, cultural activities, physical and mental well-being, vocational planning, leadership and governance, Boyd said.

"I am not aware of any similar programs where conscious effort is being made to formalize and elaborate as many different dimensions of the program as I think we're proposing," Bertram Biles, assistant dean for sponsored programs, said. "That's one of the reasons that it may attract some national attention if we're successful, and I believe we will be."

Biles has two roles in the new Smith House format. He is on the board of directors of the house and is chairman of the fund-raising committee.

The Department of Housing and the administration decided to close the Smith Cooperative House immediately prior to the 1983 fall semester. The decision was made because, with a shortage of residents, the house was not financially feasible, nor was it following the scholastic outline requested by Dr. Irene Putnam when she donated funds to KSU Foundation to begin the house in 1958, said David Boyd, an alumnus of the house.

He said Smith House had become an overflow outlet for the residence hall system. When the house was no longer needed for its overflow function, it began to operate under capacity. The housing department viewed this as a sign of insufficient interest and need to keep Smith open, so it decided to discontinue its lease on the building with the Foundation.

"It was an astonishing bit of insight that lead Boyd to begin the creation of the Smith Alumni Association in the spring of 1983," Biles said.

Before the first alumni reunion was held, several steps were taken to create a foundation for the Smith Alumni Association. In early February 1983, Boyd said he anticipated closure of the house and sent letters to eight alumni suggesting an alumni meeting.

On June 30, 1983, after the housing department had closed the house, Boyd sent letters to more than 300 alumni setting a reunion date for Oct. 29, 1983.

On Sept. 23, 1983, the articles of incorporation of the Maitland E. Smith Scholarship House Alumni Association were officially registered with the state of Kansas as a non-profit organization.

The alumni reunion was successful, Boyd said.

"We had about 47 guys back from all over the country — from Oregon, Virginia, Iowa, Texas, Colorado and Nebraska."

"At our reunion, we brought everybody up-to-date on what had been going on, and we all voted unanimously to accept the responsibilities of running the scholarship house," Boyd said.

The alumni reunion also kicked off the fund-raising campaign to raise money to refurbish, re-equip and prepare the house for occupancy, he said. The association estimated it would cost around $40,000 to get this work done.

"We expect to get most of our $40,000 from the Smith alumni alone," Boyd said. From the alumni present at the reunion, more than $9,000 was donated.

"Basically what we're doing is a two-step process. Each of the men that attended the reunion agreed to contact eight or nine other alumni. So these 47 are going to each contact eight or nine men and that way we are going to reach all 300 alumni of the house," Boyd said.

After the goal of $40,000 is reached, the alumni will probably shoot for an annual fund raising effort of about $10,000. These funds will be used for house improvements and program enhancements for the Scholars Program, he said.

"We have our budget set up so that the operation of the house should be entirely self-sufficient, including a large amount for maintenance and improvements," Boyd said.

The operating capacity of the house will be 40 men who will pay $177 per month to live in the house. This represents a savings of about $400 a year compared to other University living opportunities, he said.

Students chosen for the program must show scholastic promise and have some financial need.

"We will be recruiting students from three areas; from men who would have lived in the house this year, from prospective high school seniors and from men who are currently freshmen, sophomores and juniors on campus," Biles said.

Boyd said, "We expect to have 15 to 20 freshmen, 10 to 12 returning Smithies and then we will attract from 8 to 15 men from campus."

"We started our recruiting effort with men to whom the University had already offered a scholarship," Biles said.

Along with an open invitation to apply, all deans and department heads will be invited to nominate men for consideration as participants in the Smith Scholars Program for next year.

"We will attract an academically outstanding group of men — men who will be leaders in their various disciplines, who will be leaders in their departments and who will collaborate with others in the house to help each other. We're looking for that kind of spirit," Biles said.

University improves access for handicapped

By RHONDA BROWN
Collegian Reporter

Within the next month the University will be reviewed for its compliance with the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 regarding program accessibility to the handicapped.

A 1978 review by a faculty committee found some areas of the campus needed improved accessibility, including parking for the handicapped, curb cuts and architectural changes.

The Rehabilitation Act of 1973, Section 504 states, "No otherwise qualified handicapped individual...shall, solely by reason of his handicap, be excluded from the participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving federal financial assistance."

"We have certified that we are committed to a goal of having 100 percent accessibility," Earl Nolting, director of student development, said.

The act requires the University to make all of its programs and classes accessible for handicapped students. All of the buildings do not have to be accessible, but the programs must be.

"What that means," Nolting said, "is that while you don't have to have every building barrier-free, the classes and the areas a student has to have access to in order to complete his or her educational program will be accessible to them. If you can't get the student into the office, you take the office to the student."

Nolting recalled an incident one afternoon about a year ago when he noticed a young woman in a wheelchair trying to get across the curb at the intersection of Mid-Campus Drive and Claflin. She was trying to get from Waters Hall over to Call Hall to attend a class.

"I gave her some assistance with that particular problem, got her name and talked about the problem she was having," he said. He said he responded by writing a letter to John Dunbar, dean of the Department of Agriculture, regarding the plight of this particular student. As a result of the letter, $5,000 was given by the University to Services for Students with Physical Limitations for curb cuts.

Seven cuts are currently being made: two are located at the corner of Claflin and Mid-Campus Drive, two south of Anderson Hall, one at the southwest corner of Willard Hall, and two at the Farrell Library parking lot.

"In the past year I have heard complaints from physically limited students about sidewalk inaccessibility (more) than about anything else," Gretchen Holden, student development instructor, said.

"I can jump curbs to an extent, and I could jump the curb at Mid-Campus Drive and Claflin, but one of the corners was just high enough that if I'd jump it, half of the time I'd fall back off of it," said Carol Baldwin, a wheelchair-bound student, said.

Baldwin, sophomore in animal science, said it is a dangerous corner because of a combination of high curbs and lots of traffic.

"Thank heavens they've put in two major curb cuts there," she said.

Baldwin added that the bleachers in Weber Hall are a constant irritation to her.

"I took a horse-judging class, and all the kids were up in the bleachers," she said. "There are these three dark runways, and I had to be down there and I couldn't hear what the teacher was saying. I'm not seeing the same thing the kids are seeing, and I'm not hearing at all."

Nolting, who also serves on a committee which looks out for the interests of the handicapped student, the Coordinating Committee for Handicapped Concerns, said, "We (the committee) have some work to do with some buildings obviously in terms of meeting our goals, but from when we started several years ago, we've made great strides.

"There's a lot yet to be done, but we have committed ourselves to the goal of having all our programs 100 percent accessible."

Baldwin said she believes that while the University still has its shortcomings, improvements are taking place.

"It's (campus accessibility) gotten better, that's the main thing — it has gotten better in the last year."

Microwave disc offers increased broadcasting

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

Kansas State Network (KSN) installed a new microwave grid disc Jan. 27 on the tower near Calvin Hall.

KSN will use the disc to transmit sports events out to Silver Lake and other areas. The grid was first used to transmit the K-State vs. Iowa State men's basketball game Wednesday night.

The disc could provide great possibilities for the University, Del Staab, chief engineer in extension radio and television, said.

Staab said the grid could help the University with teleconferencing through a link-up for the satellite in Wichita that can be transmitted to Topeka.

Another possibility for the University is to use the grid to transmit Landon Lectures.

In the past, the University took orders from radio stations wishing to air the lectures and went through Southwestern Bell to obtain connections to various stations.

"It's been a mess since the break-up (of AT & T)," Staab said. "In the past, if we had a station decide at the last minute that it wanted to transmit the lecture, we just had to call Salina and the connection was made. This last time (for Sen. Edward Kennedy's Jan. 30 lecture) we had to go through New York, and the connection was made all the way from New York. That's why the microwave is such a good thing."

"They (KSN) wanted to use the disc for the (Kennedy) Landon Lecture," Staab said, "but they were having some problems, and they worked all day Saturday (before the lecture) but they didn't get it fixed in time."

There was an understanding with KSN at the time the grid was approved that the University would be able to use it by pre-arrangement, Staab said.

KSN had to go through many people before it could get permission to set up the grid, he said.

"They had to do a structural analysis of the tower because it's so old. It was built in 1924," Staab said. "They took all the measurements of the tower and the grid, which is eight feet in diameter, and fed them into a computer and came up with the different loads the tower could withstand at all different locations up and down the tower."

The 60-year-old tower was found to be strong enough to hold the grid.

"We didn't want the tower to fall down because it is a Kansas Association of Broadcasters monument. It is a memorial to Grover Cobb," Staab said.

Before the grid was installed, KSN broadcasted sports events with a small microwave dish on top of Ahearn Field House, he said.

"This last time (during the K-State vs. KU game) the dish would not stay in place, and they had to rent an 80-foot cherry picker (a mechanical lift) to mount the antenna on," Staab said. "I think the results of that day and the costs speeded them up on installation (of the grid) over here, because it had been approved for some time."

Board says late report not severe

In a statement released Friday, Tribunal ruled that elections procedures do not require candidates to be removed from the ballot for violations of expenditure report deadlines.

Accordingly, Eddie Rodriguez, candidate for student body president and junior in pre-law, was reinstated on the ballot for Wednesday's student elections.

According to the statement, elections procedures state, "violations of the election expenditure limitations, both monetary and deadlines, may result in the disqualification of the candidate responsible."

Kurt Yowell, chancellor of Tribunal and junior in agricultural economics, said the board believed Rodriguez turning in his first of four expenditure reports a day late was not as severe an infraction as if he had been late on his third or fourth report.

Yowell said Tribunal will not be as lenient with later infractions or with appeals from student senator candidates, who are required to turn in only one expenditure report.

Justice Department survey shows public's view on severity of crimes

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Most Americans consider violent crimes more serious than property offenses but view purposeful dumping of hazardous waste as a worse act than some homicides, the Justice Department said Sunday.

Reporting on the largest survey of attitudes toward crime to date, the department's Bureau of Justice Statistics said public attitudes are more consistent than might be assumed from the disparity of criminal sentences around the nation.

The survey, based on questions asked of 60,000 people over age 17 in 1977, could be a first step in establishing uniform sentencing guidelines for judges and juries.

The bureau said that the public ranked so-called victimless crimes, such as personal use of small amounts of drugs, among the least serious of offenses. But the agency said that most people consider bombings, corporate fraud, environmental pollution, and official corruption to be major offenses.

A total of 294 crimes were ranked but each individual was only asked to rate the seriousness of 25 specific criminal events.

The most serious offense, receiving a 72.1 score, was a bombing of a public building in which 20 people are killed. The least serious offense, receiving a 0.2 score, was a person under 16 playing hooky from school. The numerical ratings were mathematically weighted so that a crime considered twice as serious as another would receive a rating double the other crime's rating.

Steven R. Schlesinger, the bureau's director, said refinement of that measure ultimately "could help establish appropriate sentencing guidelines and...could even indicate more accurately than at present whether crime is increasing or decreasing and by how much."

He noted that the government's current figures on crime rates treat each type of crime as equally important, and thus an increase of 100 purse snatchings affects the crime rate as much as 100 murders.

Although still in its early stages, Schlesinger said the system of developing a crime rate weighted by the seriousness of each crime is "exciting."

The seventh highest severity rating, 39.1, was given in the situation in which a factory knowingly gets rid of its waste in a way that pollutes the water supply of a city resulting in the death of 20 people. But the eighth most serious crime, with a 35.7 rating, was given to a person stabbing a victim to death.

A person running a narcotics ring was rated at 33.8 while a woman stabbing her husband to death was viewed as less serious, receiving a 27.9 rating.

Drug won't solve rape problem

It's time for women and men to wake up and take a stand concerning punishment of rapists and sexual offenders.

The attorney for Christopher Haines, a 23-year-old from El Dorado convicted in Wichita two weeks ago of rape, kidnapping and sodomy, has asked that Haines be the first man in Kansas to be treated with Depo-Provera, a drug that greatly reduces sex drive, instead of serving a jail term. The fact that such an alternative is even considered implicitly displays a lack of concern and understanding in the judicial system for the seriousness of sexual offenses.

Haines' attorney argues that some men have abnormal levels of the hormone testosterone, which drives them to attack women, and treatment with Depo-Provera makes them tranquil and unlikely to repeat such attacks.

This argument simply doesn't wash. Using biology to reason away society's ills should not be tolerated. Men have traditionally been conditioned by society to be forceful and influential, accepting as correct a role as dominator and controller. Consequently, "weak" displays of emotion are often denounced, but sudden displays of temper are to be revered. This is evident because rapists are not punished as severely as they should be.

Rape is correctly perceived as a crime of violence and not a sexual act only, but most judicial decisions seem not to realize this. In Texas last year, Joseph Frank Smith, a repeat sexual offender, was put on probation and treated with Depo-Provera instead of serving a jail term. Now the possibility exists of allowing Haines, who also was convicted of rape in 1978, to bypass prison in favor of a treatment that will do nothing to change his violence-prone attitude.

Altering his sex drive will not prevent Haines from attacking yet a third woman. The Depo-Provera treatment only serves as a parody of justice that attempts to smooth over surface problems and ignore the roots of a greater ill — a sweeping attitude that degrades women and allows abuse against them.

But neither is prison an effective "treatment" for rapists. Instead, separate treatment facilities for sexual offenders should be established. Using counseling, geared to changing attitudes toward women as objects of hostility and understanding how society's masculine expectations foster violence, would prove to be far more effective in alleviating rape than any ill-conceived judicial decree.

Sexism hidden in language

Equality of the sexes may not be on everyone's mind right now, especially without an Equal Rights Amendment to defend or condemn. Some may even believe that there is no inequality in societal views and treatment of men and women. Unfortunately, we are constantly surrounded by subtle reminders that this is not yet true.

Businesses keep us informed as to the necessary distinction between the sexes with their Ladies' Nights, ads that tell us which clothes or hardware appliances are "for you guys" or "for you gals," and with signs that say "Haircuts — men $6, women $14," regardless of length or style.

It's easy to overlook little things such as these. After all, they aren't exactly of earth-shattering proportions. But they do reflect society's internalized lesser view of women. Check the TV guides for college basketball listings. College basketball isn't divided into men's and women's, but rather college basketball and women's college basketball.

lege basketball. The people responsible for program listings may not even realize it, but they are relegating women's athletics to second-class status.

Many prime-time action and adventure shows still rely on the old girl-gets-in-trouble-boy-rescues-her routine. Many newspapers still run, under pictures of brides, their "new" name, Mrs. John Smith, and below it, of course, their "former" name (Carla Jones). The Manhattan Mercury has even been known to run anniversary stories in which the wife's name never appears. (Or perhaps it just wasn't relevant to the story.)

These somewhat subtle slams on women aren't the really major issues of sexual equality, but their message is clearly important. The fact that they are so often overlooked or ignored only helps to further the perception that women are not equals, but second-class citizens.

A prayer for prayer in schools

Let us pray.
Lord, today we ask you to help President Reagan in his mission to return prayer to public schools.

We understand mandatory prayer in schools is a chance to help children not fortunate enough to have parents who will teach them the right way to believe. The power of prayer is strong enough to convert the worst sinner in a second grade class.

We pray you will help the lawmakers of this great country create legislation to guide these innocent minds on the path of righteousness. The laws must be strict to ensure children learn only acceptable beliefs.

We believe when prayers are returned to schools, teachers must stand as moral examples for their students. Those with different beliefs and life styles must no longer be allowed to corrupt our children.

We know some subjects are not being taught in accordance with your will. When the power of prayer converts children to the right way of thinking, they will realize creationism is the only true science. Evolutionary theories are the work of the devil. Give the courts your guidance when we call upon them to decide what will be taught.

We ask you to protect our mission to return prayer to schools from the godless communists and heretics who will try to halt it. These people should not be allowed to teach our children. If our children are no longer exposed to their ideas, there will be no more converts to their sinful ways.

We thank you for President Reagan. In the war of good against evil, we at last have an ally.

We thank you for giving the president the insight to know right from wrong. He knows prayer is right and will try to pass laws to ensure everyone prays.

We thank you for giving the president and his supporters the wisdom to select the right way for our children to pray.

We thank you for the president's ability to see that warnings about the separation of church and state are unnecessary.

We thank you for making the president understand that freedom of religion is not as important as public display of religion. The Bible must have misquoted Jesus when he said, "And when you pray, you are not to be as the hypocrites; for they love to stand and pray in the synagogues and on the street corners, in order to be seen by men. But you, when you pray, go into your inner room, and when you have shut your door, pray to your Father who is in secret and your Father who sees in secret will repay you." Matthew 6:5-6.

We pray you will allow President Reagan to bring new meaning to the motto "In God we trust." Then all children and their teachers will be required to sit and pray — whether they believe or not.
Amen.

Lost in space: one satellite

LOST: One satellite. Last seen in outer space by crew of space shuttle Challenger. Answers to "Westar VI." Worth $75 million. REWARD. Contact Western Union, owner, or NASA, delivery agent.

I haven't seen this classified ad placed in any newspapers, but I imagine it wouldn't help matters any.

I watched the launch of the space shuttle Challenger Friday morning. It always amazes me how man has figured out how to fly, let alone venture into space. But Challenger's flawless lift-off made me forget all the early failures of the space program. Someday, I'm going to the Kennedy Space Center in Cape Canaveral, Fla., and watch a lift-off.

The news from Challenger Friday afternoon sounded good. I heard the Westar VI satellite was launched into orbit and was behaving itself. Everything looked good.

The satellite was supposed to go into a synchronous orbit. The Associated Press explained this type of orbit as being 22,300 miles in altitude above the equator, where the satellite's speed matches the earth's speed. This makes the satellite appear as if it is motionless above the earth, like a dog at its master's feet.

After a day of playing and watching basketball, I heard the satellite was "lost." How anyone could lose a satellite is a mystery to me — unless, of course, Scotty "beamed it up."

I can almost imagine a conversation between NASA controllers, at

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

the Johnson Space Center in Houston, and Challenger's astronauts.

Challenger: "Houston Control, come in, please."

NASA: "Houston Control here."

Challenger: "Houston, we have a slight problem here. Acknowledge."

NASA: "Acknowledged. What's the problem?"

Challenger: "Well, ah, we've (mumble) lost something."

NASA: "Please repeat last part of your transmission, Challenger. It sounded like you said you've lost something."

Challenger: "Affirmative."

NASA: "Challenger, what did you lose? A couple of tiles? A screwdriver?"

Challenger: "Ah, well, we've lost (mumble) Westar."

NASA: "Come on, guys. Don't kid around. It sounded like you said you've lost Westar."

Challenger: "Houston, we're not kidding. Acknowledge."

NASA: "Acknowledged. What happened?"

Challenger: "Well, we're not sure. Are we insured?"

NASA: "Affirmative. By the way, you're all fired. Over and out."

I want to point out the above "conversation" didn't occur. NASA hasn't fired any astronauts. In fact, NASA officials praised astronauts Ronald McNair and Robert Stewart for their efforts in launching and tracking the satellite.

Some people believe Westar VI is whirling around in space. Others think its booster rocket exploded, destroying the satellite. A few may think the Soviets have done something with the communications satellite.

The astronauts have another chance to find the lost satellite. On Tuesday and Thursday, astronauts Bruce McCandless and Stewart will do some kind of backpack which will allow them to "walk" in space without a lifeline to the space shuttle.

I guess you could say they won't have an "umbilical cord" to the mother ship.

While Buck Rogers has finally entered the 1980s, I hope NASA keeps track of McCandless and Stewart. Otherwise, it could be placing another ad in the classified section.

LOST: Two astronauts. Last seen "walking" in outer space...

Board should be recognized, too

I'm going to write something today that won't make me very popular with journalism department types who scream "objectivity" out of one side of their mouths. I'm going to write about that esteemed and sometimes even revered group known as the Board of Student Publications.

Maybe I'm speaking from lack of campus experience, but I believe something is seriously wrong when many Collegian staff members, including your's truly, don't even know who is on the board that controls the newspaper. In fact, some of the candidates for editor this semester didn't know the names of some of the members who interviewed them.

Blame cannot really be placed on the board for this low-profile image. As hard as it is to admit, the blame lies in the newsroom and apparently has for quite some time.

Journalists, in their quest for objectivity, sometimes lose perspective. And that's the problem in a nutshell. We are taught, or maybe we draw our own conclusions, that it is improper to report on almost all activities of the newspaper. This belief is just plain dumb.

Fact is, the board is elected by the same students who vote for Student Senate. But there is never the fanfare or debate of senate elections. The board meets a few times a year in an office somewhere in Kedzie Hall and upon emerging, draws attention comparable to the fervor of Groundhog Day.

If any campus group deserves attention, it is the publications board. It chooses the people who produce the Royal Purple yearbook, the Collegian and the Campus Directory. Oh, yes. There are issues. But we never seem to hear about them.

LEE WHITE

What about this notion of legal autonomy from the University? Can a newspaper really be called legally autonomous when its finances are overseen by the University comptroller and part of its funding comes from Senate? I don't think so, but some do. If the University wanted to, it could shut off all our utilities tomorrow and the Collegian might never see the light of day again.

The risks involved in depending on outside sources for funding don't seem to outweigh the benefits right now. But I'm paranoid. Press freedoms can evaporate quickly and without warning. The fog, after all, comes on little cat feet.

And what if the board should become over-zealous, telling student editors what to publish and not to publish, what headline type to use and the like? I'm confident that the current board wouldn't try stunts like that, but, again, the possibility remains.

These are some of the issues that those responsible for getting the news into print on college campuses must face every day. Pretty heavy stuff — and it could get heavier.

Still, these issues deserve to be in the open. The Collegian, the Royal Purple and the Campus Directory are fully, or in part, by and for K-State students. As long as we're going to take money from the student body, we must realize that there is a necessary accountability above and beyond what privately-owned newspapers must uphold.

As long as normal editorial judgments aren't jeopardized, I would favor a more active line of communication between the board and students. The students, after all, are the shareholders in Student Publications Inc., and should have the chance to reap dividends in one form or another.

Take time to study the issues facing this board and others. Get to know the people on the board. They're public servants. Staff members and most members of the board are required to sign loyalty oaths just like other state employees. I don't know about the rest of them, but I spend most of my time defending the constitutional amendment that butters my bread.

The fact that you're reading this column should be proof that press freedoms are alive and well at K-State. Apathy is dying and a newborn interest in the affairs of the upper echelon is taking its place.

Vote your conscience Wednesday, but above all, vote. And after the ballots are counted, make those elected to the Board of Student Publications and Student Senate earn your trust.

Ex-aides work for Reagan's re-election

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At least two former high-ranking Reagan administration officials who left under a cloud are working to re-elect the president, and a third is helping write the platform on which Reagan will run.

Jim Lake, spokesman for the Reagan-Bush campaign, said former Interior Secretary James Watt and the CIA's one-time spy chief, Max Hugel, are working as volunteers in the re-election effort. And Reagan's first national security adviser, Richard V. Allen, is a paid consultant to the Republican National Committee, where officials said he is helping draft the foreign policy section of the GOP platform.

Watt, whose 2½ years of stewardship of the nation's public lands and natural resources had been swirled in controversy, is not a regular member of the re-election committee, Lake said. But he added that campaign director Ed Rollins "has said we will use him in any way we can."

Watt is "very strong with conservative, fundamentalist religious groups and with many in the West," Lake said, and he will be asked to speak to organizations that still consider him something of a national hero.

Hugel, Lake said, is a member of a campaign advisory committee made up of people who worked in Reagan's past campaigns. Before he was appointed deputy director for operations at the Central Intelligence Agency, Hugel organized ethnic groups for Reagan in the 1980 campaign.

He was among the first Reagan administration officials to leave government.

In July 1981, The Washington Post published the allegations of two brothers who had had business dealings with Hugel and claimed he had illegally engaged in a stock manipulation scheme with them. Hugel denied any wrongdoing but resigned immediately, saying he wanted to avoid imposing a burden on the CIA and his colleagues at the agency.

His accusers, Thomas R. and Samuel F. McNell, both of New York, dropped out of sight almost immediately after their charges were published. Their financial empire has since crumbled, and two of their companies accused the brothers of stealing the firm's assets.

Hugel sued the McNells for libel in New York and said he won a default judgment when they failed to appear in court. He has since opened a consulting firm in Washington and represents the state of New Hampshire in its dealings with the federal government.

No charges were ever brought in connection with the McNells' allegations, which they claimed were supported by surreptitiously made tape recordings.

Allen was forced out as assistant to the president for national security affairs less than a year after Reagan took office.

He had been the subject of Justice Department and White House staff investigations into his receipt of $1,000 and two watches from Japanese associates and certain misstatements on his required financial disclosure form.

Although the Justice Department concluded there were no grounds for criminal charges against Allen and the White House counsel's office decided the reporting errors were inadvertent, Allen and the controversy that surrounded him had become a political liability.

mediately accept it," Wazzan said he told Gemayel.

The presidential palace said Gemayel asked Wazzan to stay on as a caretaker until a new Cabinet could be formed. He immediately called in the speaker of Parliament, Kamel Assad, to begin discussions on formation of a new government.

Wazzan, prime minister since 1980, had submitted his resignation twice since Sept. 26, but Gemayel refused to accept it.

Wazzan and his Cabinet have been under fire from Lebanese opposition groups of all religious factions, who accuse them of being puppets of Gemayel. The opposition maintains the government is in the hands of rightist Christians of the Phalange Party, headed by Gemayel's father, Pierre.

On Saturday, Nabih Berri, the leader of Amal, urged Moslem Cabinet members to leave the government and asked Moslems in the Lebanese army to lay down their arms.

Under the unwritten "national covenant" made in 1943, the prime minister must be a Sunni Moslem, while the president is a Maronite Christian. Five of the Cabinet seats are allotted to Christians, four go to Moslems and one to a Druse.

The Druse finance minister, Adel Hamieh, resigned last September to protest the Lebanese army's shelling of Druse villages in the hills. Hamieh was never replaced.

At Vatican City, Pope John Paul II urgently called for a truce in Lebanon, saying that "bloody clashes and intense bombardments" have reached unprecedented levels. The pontiff asked the more than 25,000 faithful gathered in St. Peter's Square to pray so "hope in a future of peace and respect can survive within the hearts of all the Lebanese who sincerely love their country."

Salvadorans in Miami who, he charged, direct death squad activity.

However, officials familiar with the administration's evidence disputed his complaint, saying the information is far from conclusive and, in some cases, has been contradicted by other embassy reports filed after White's departure.

In addition, the officials, speaking only on condition they not be identified, said the embassy has lost contact with the two Salvadoran sources who provided the information cited by White last week.

One official said the military officer who tied D'Aubuisson to the assassination of Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero was himself murdered in San Salvador about two years ago "probably because of what he knew."

Two die in weekend accidents

Two people were killed in weekend traffic accidents in Kansas, including a 14-year-old Hugoton girl who died Friday night after being struck by a car as she and a friend walked along Kansas 25 just north of her hometown.

The victim, Kelly J. Clarke, was walking southbound when she was hit by a southbound car, a Kansas Highway Patrol spokesman said. A friend, Shannon Harris, 15, also of Hugoton, also was hit by the car, but was treated and released from a local hospital.

An 85-year-old Emporia woman died as a result of an accident in her hometown Saturday morning, police said.

The victim, Frederika Hill, was standing in front of her parked car on a city street when her car was struck from behind by another vehicle, causing her car to hit her, police said.

Concert gets worldwide audience

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Firebrand fiddler Charlie Daniels carried the "Nashville Sound" to an estimated 15 million people worldwide with a rousing weekend concert broadcast live by the Voice of America.

Daniels' 10th annual "Volunteer Jam" concert, featuring a smorgasbord of American music, was broadcast Saturday night and early Sunday.

Voice of America had four correspondents at the Municipal Auditorium who broadcast from the free-wheeling concert in English, Spanish, Polish and Hindi.

VOA officials said the signal would have been strongest in southern Asia, all of Africa and throughout Latin America. It also could have been picked up in the Soviet Union, China and Europe, they said.

Four segments, ranging from 20 minutes to 50 minutes each, were broadcast live, and the rest of the eight-hour concert was recorded by VOA for a replay of highlights in a few weeks.

During a 50-minute segment aimed at English-speaking audiences, Daniels, fellow fiddler Roy Acuff and guitarist Boxcar Willie teamed up on "The Wabash Cannonball" and "Night Train to Memphis."

Nothing but the truth — or is it?

NEW YORK — Mayor Edward Koch, who has cultivated an image as a candid and outspoken politician, says he's not always completely truthful.

Not that he actually lies — he just doesn't tell the whole truth, he said. Nor is he required to do so, he added.

And if the less-than-whole truth misleads the public, the fault lies not with the mayor but with reporters who do not phrase their questions correctly, Koch said.

"You ask me the question and ask it sufficiently pointedly and you will get an accurate response," Koch told reporters.

He was then asked whether the public might be misinformed if the question was not pointed enough, and the mayor was not complete in his answer.

"Then you," he replied, leaning forward in his chair and pointing at a reporter, "have to be sure that the questions are sufficiently encompassing to make sure that doesn't occur."

Muslim leader throws support behind Jackson

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — In the Rev. Jesse Jackson's moment of glory — a welcome home after his Syrian triumph — a chant rippling through the crowd called for another man. "Speak, Farrakhan. Speak."

The man answering the call was Minister Louis Farrakhan, a spellbinding orator. His presence was a sign that Jackson again had done something other politicians could not.

Farrakhan is the leader of the Nation of Islam, an offshoot of the Black Muslim separatist group once led by Elijah Muhammad, who rejected the American political system and traditionally regarded the white man as the "devil."

Under Elijah Muhammad, "politics was just a game among white folks...A black man had nothing to gain," says C. Eric Lincoln, professor of religion and culture at Duke University and author of "The Black Muslims In America."

Yet now, Farrakhan, who scholars say considers himself Elijah Muhammad's only true apostle, has immersed himself in a campaign for the nation's highest office.

Farrakhan, 50, says he will accompany Jackson to City Hall on Thursday to register to vote for the first time in his life and bring hundreds of others with him.

That even surprises him. "If you had told me just a few years ago that I would be participating with Reverend Jackson in a presidential campaign, I probably would have thought you were a little off," he said in one of the first interviews he's given in seven years.

Farrakhan says he and other Muslims will help Jackson's voter registration drive by signing up to vote and "encouraging black people who felt locked out of the political process to do likewise."

Though it is a campaign for a black man, Muslim scholars say it still is unprecedented for the Nation of Islam and Farrakhan, a protege of Malcolm X who took over the slain minister's New York mosque after his death in 1965.

But Farrakhan says his support of Jackson's campaign is consistent with Elijah Muhammad's teachings. Elijah Muhammad, he explained, said "if we have a black person who is standing up for justice and is not afraid to fight for the best interests of our people, we should give him the total backing and support of our people."

In Jackson's candidacy, he says, "you see a person who is not only good for black people...but ultimately good for America."

In recent months, Farrakhan also has proclaimed a willingness to work with other groups — including whites — for social and political change.

"There can be no more sidelines today," Farrakhan said at a Washington rally with Jackson. "We watched Dr. Martin Luther King march from Selma to Montgomery. The majority were on the sidelines."

Farrakhan has accompanied Jackson on the campaign trail in Washington, Chicago and Detroit. Jackson aides consider him a surrogate for Jackson at rallies. Muslim bodyguards have supplemented Secret Service security in some cities.

"God has opened my heart to my brother," Farrakhan said in Washington. "I refuse to let Reverend Jesse Jackson go down into the Valley of the Shadow of Death by himself."

Some speculate Farrakhan, who journeyed with Jackson to Syria, may have been instrumental in the negotiations that capped the highlight of Jackson's candidacy — the release of captured U.S. airman Robert Goodman.

"I'm sure Reverend Jackson considers him an adviser and calls upon him to advise as he did on his trip to Syria," said Arnold Pinkney, Jackson's campaign manager. Jackson aides also say Farrakhan represents another band in their "Rainbow Coalition" of the disenfranchised.

Farrakhan's role in the campaign follows a gradual shift toward increased involvement on the part of his branch of the black Muslims in America.

After Elijah Muhammad's death, the Muslims split into rival groups. One group, now named the American Muslim Mission, evolved into a religious sect that urges members to support the American system, follows the orthodox Islamic stance and accepts whites. It is led by one of Elijah Muhammad's sons, Wallace, known as Imam W. Deen Muhammad.

The Mission, whose active membership is more than 100,000, supported Jimmy Carter.

Farrakhan, who formed the Nation of Islam in 1978, represents the more dissident wing of black Islam in the United States. It resurrected black nationalism and Farrakhan says the group is geared to blacks.

White people, he said, "have had prophets to teach and guide them. Our first mission is to our own people."

Larry Mamiya, associate professor of religion and Africana studies at Vassar, estimates the group may have only 10,000 hardcore members. Farrakhan wouldn't pinpoint a membership figure.

Air Force colonel speaks about space future

By TERESA CAWTHON
Collegian Reporter

"We're on the move. Space is the place. The academic community is very interested in anything to do with space, and we're helping them with that," said Colonel Gerald M. May, director of plans and programs for the U.S. Air Force Space Command at Peterson Air Force Base, Colo.

May was the guest speaker for the 1984 Area K Arnold Air Society and Angel Flight Conclave Saturday at the Manhattan Holiday.

The Lt. Lloyd Birch Vorhies Squadron of K-State hosted the conclave, which included Air Force ROTC squadrons from Oklahoma State University, the University of Oklahoma, University of Nebraska and University of Kansas.

May's remarks at the awards dinner related some of the history of the Air Force Space Command, as well as some of its goals.

The space command came into being on Sept. 1, 1982, after an earlier announcement of its formation by the chief of staff of the Air Force.

"Why a space command? Well, space is a place. It's just like the land and the sea and the air. We activated the command, not to militarize space, but rather to preserve our right of self-defense and protect the assets that we have," May said.

The Soviet threat is a primary concern of the space command, he said, adding that they have a major military force in space.

"Over the past decade, they (the Soviets) have launched three to four to five times as many spacecraft as we have into space," May said. "Seventy percent of everything that they launch into space is military or military-related. Last year they launched some 74 spacecraft, and we launched eight."

May explained that the Soviets have the world's only space weapon, the orbital anti-satellite system.

"They launch it on a regular basis, and they test it. In the past few years they have launched and tested it some 20 times," he said. "We have watched them launch the interceptor; we have watched them launch the target; we watched the intercept take place."

The recently announced American space station was not addressed in May's prepared remarks. He did, however, discuss the Soviet space station, the Salyut-Soyuz vehicle.

"Since 1977 the Soviet cosmonauts have logged more than five man-years in space, whereas we have logged 200 man-days in space. They have discovered a purpose for a manned space station that incorporates surveillance capabilities, target selection, doing repairs in orbit, positive command and control-type operations," he said.

Following the speech, May said he expected the flight profile for the shuttle over the next year to double the American space time to 400 man-days, still far behind the Soviets.

"As I understand it, the (American) space station is going to be developed by NASA using NASA funds. The $8 or 9 billion program initially that it is going to cost is going to be oriented towards scientific and research and development efforts, and NASA is going to spearhead that operation," he said.

The newly announced space station, May said, is part of President Reagan's initiative. The government is examining ways to be able to afford the space station and develop requirements. The U.S. Air Force also is looking at the requirements for the space station and at ways it can participate.

Space systems could alter the basic premise of our national strategy by providing an option for bringing defense back into the game, he said.

The enthusiastic response May's remarks received carried over into the awards presentation which followed. K-State's squadron earned a number of awards.

For its work in the community and on campus, K-State was named the Area K Outstanding Squadron.

Karen Pullen, junior in political science, was named the outstanding squadron commander.

Anthony Dearth, senior in computer science, was selected as the Area K Outstanding Squadron staff officer.

Capt. Steven Stambaugh, K-State squadron adviser, was named outstanding squadron adviser for Area K.

Additionally, K-State's Angel Flight received the area protocol award.

Congress to review action on U.S. troop withdrawal

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Action on U.S. involvement in El Salvador and Lebanon, including a non-binding resolution urging withdrawal of U.S. peacekeeping troops from Beirut, will occupy Congress' attention this week as lawmakers drive toward a mid-month recess.

The House is to consider on Tuesday a measure that would reinstate a requirement, first enacted in 1981, that President Reagan certify each six months that the Salvadoran government is making progress in human rights as a condition of continued aid to the Central American country.

Congress approved such a requirement late last year, but Reagan vetoed the measure after lawmakers began their long Christmas recess.

The president, meanwhile, plans to send to Capitol Hill legislation that would implement a bipartisan commission's recommendation of a five-year, $8 billion economic aid package for Central America.

Reagan also wants to provide $312 million in additional military assistance to El Salvador over two years. This aid also would be contingent on human rights improvements, but the president would be able to control the flow of money as he saw fit under the administration proposal.

Hypnosis: method and master of behavior

Area hypnotist stresses useful side of practice

Hypnosis, long considered a mysterious tool of quacks or evil doctors on television shows, has proven useful in the fields of medicine and in self-regulation of behavior.

Hypnosis is defined as an altered state of consciousness by Gregory Potter, a certified hypnotist practicing in Manhattan.

Potter completed a course of study at the Ethical Hypnosis Training Center in South Orange, N. J., and is a member of the Association to Advance Ethical Hypnosis.

"There are many misconceptions about ethical hypnosis. For example, there is no danger of failing to awaken from a hypnotic trance. Hypnosis, in order to maintain itself, is dependent upon almost constant outside stimuli," Potter said. "A subject left in a deep hypnotic state will fall into a natural sleep within a few minutes and awaken when the sleep is completed."

He also said that a subject will not, under hypnotic suggestion, do something that is against his will, moral values or better judgment.

If a hypnotist were to suggest that a person in a trance go downtown and rob Holiday Jewelers and bring back the jewelry, the person would not do it unless he were a jewel thief anyway. Then hypnosis might make him a more efficient thief, Potter said.

Another common misconception about hypnosis is that a subject will not remember what occurred during hypnosis. On the contrary, the subject remains fully aware of everything that is happening, Potter said.

The only limitation placed on hypnosis by Kansas law is that no one under the age of 18 may be hypnotized for entertainment purposes.

Gregory Potter

There are two types of hypnosis: stage hypnosis and clinical hypnosis.

"The main difference is that stage hypnosis involves having the person appear humorous and sometimes even ridiculous. Actually, the hypnosis is not different — it is used for different purposes," Potter said.

Stage hypnosis has helped make people aware of and fostered a curiosity about hypnosis. Potter said he hopes people will see beyond the fun and antics and understand the value of the tool.

Potter said there are ethical hypnotists and unethical hypnotists. The ethical hypnotist is usually a member of a professional association such as the Association to Advance Ethical Hypnosis. Another way of ensuring that a hypnotist is ethical is to obtain a referral from a family physician, he said.

"Potter's ethics were above reproach. He even made a tape recording of each of our sessions," Rachel Moreland, circulation librarian at Farrell Library, said. Moreland consulted Potter about a year ago, primarily for weight loss.

"I had stopped smoking several months before," she said, "and I started gaining weight. I had gained 20 pounds before I knew it, and then my weight just kept edging up."

"Part of the reason I consulted Potter was curiosity," she said. Like most, Moreland's exposure to hypnosis had been of the stage variety or the type represented on television where the sinister hypnotist has the innocent subject do an evil deed.

"I really didn't lose any weight while I was seeing Potter," Moreland said. "You have to incorporate a good diet with his program. It's like many other things; you get out of it what you put in it. He did help me control my urges though, and I stopped gaining additional weight."

Potter said he tape-records most of his sessions with clients as a learning tool. He can listen to them afterward and see how he can help the client more effectively.

"During the sessions, he would tell me that if anything were suggested to me that went against my better judgment, I would come out of the trance. That made me feel very secure," Moreland said. "I wouldn't have gone to him if I hadn't felt he was ethical. It was important to me."

Potter gives his clients brochures to assist in self-study. Moreland said she felt the positive attitude of goal setting and being in control of one's own life, as expressed in the brochures, really helped her.

"I no longer have trouble getting up in the mornings. I used to wake up every couple of hours during the night, so we worked on that in several of my sessions. Through the sessions and through the self-hypnosis he taught me, I now wake up after six hours of sleep ready to get up. I used to think I needed eight hours of sleep. I think part of the improvement is a better quality of sleep because I can relax myself," Moreland said.

A subject may use hypnosis to improve concentration, study habits or recall. Hypnosis will help the subject focus on the three points in learning: concentration to improve impression, retention and recall. These are attained through mind organization. Along with these sessions, Potter teaches self-hypnosis.

"This is a popular program and one that I thoroughly enjoy," Potter said.

He said that he may conduct anywhere from four to 15 sessions with a subject on a routine basis for weight loss or to help a subject stop smoking. About 20 percent of his patients report rapid results, because they are ready subconsciously to attain the result, he said.

When being hypnotized, the subject should avoid analyzing what is happening, Potter said. The subject also should avoid investigation, such as thinking, "Am I there yet?" The third behavior the subject should avoid is problem solving, such as thinking about a problem at home or on the job. Instead, the subject should clear his mind and concentrate on the session, Potter said.

There are only three groups of people who cannot be hypnotized. Those are the mentally retarded, the psychotic while in a period of psychosis and someone who is drug dependent, Potter said.

"Hypnosis is simply a learning tool that teaches the subject to work better with his own mind. Therefore, a person who does not believe in the technique or in himself is not likely to try hypnosis. If a person has a closed mind to hypnosis, it is not likely to be successful," Potter said.

There are four methods that the operator may use in hypnosis.

With the direct method, the operator gives the subject a suggestion during hypnosis, such as "I eat only at mealtimes, properly and sparingly." This suggestion would be repeated often during each session, Potter said.

The next is the indirect method. Here the operator gives the subject suggestions, but leaves it for the subject to develop with his own insight.

"The indirect method is rather like coming in the back door," Potter said.

The third method is also indirect, but it is allegorical, he said. In this approach, the hypnotist tells a story or parable and lets the subject draw his own conclusion.

The last method is one which Potter said he uses infrequently. It is hypnoanalysis, which is psychotherapy under hypnosis.

The Association to Advance Ethical Hypnosis requires, by way of ethics and standards, that its members have a proper referral from a client's physician or dentist for treatment of a medical or dental problem.

"If a person were having migraine headaches and this was relieved by the use of hypnosis without proper referral, there would be a possibility that medical help, which might be necessary, is delayed. The headaches might be the result of a tumor," Potter said.

Some of the many other applications for hypnosis include anesthesia for major surgery, assertiveness training, athletic performance, burn treatment, nail biting, self-confidence and stress management, he said.

Greg Potter, certified hypnotist, explains why hypnosis works and the fallacies that are normally associated with it.

The trance experience

An inside view of hypnosis

(Editor's note: Teresa Cawthon is a Collegian reporter who was hypnotized by Gregory Potter, a certified hypnotist in Manhattan. The following story is an account of her experience.)

My curiosity just got the better of me.

After interviewing Potter, I asked him if he would be willing to hypnotize me. He complied, hypnotizing me to accomplish age regression.

Our objective was to find out who sat behind me in the classroom in first grade. Potter took down some basic information, including things I did recall such as my teacher's name, where I sat in the room and who my best friend was.

Potter had me sit in a comfortable recliner and dimmed the lights. He had me recline to the first position in the chair with my feet elevated.

He then turned on a strobe light in front of me, regulated its pulse and had me concentrate on the light.

Potter talked to me continually as I entered the hypnotic state. I was fully aware of everything that was happening to me and I was able to respond to his questions. He also described my reactions to me as they occurred.

As I went deeper into the hypnotic state, Potter said my eyelids were becoming heavier as my system and pulse slowed, sending less blood coursing through my body. Then he told me my eyes were half-closed, and finally that they were nearly closed. Potter told me that my facial expression was relaxing and that my limbs were becoming heavy.

At this time, I tried to lift my hand and found that I could not.

As I progressed deeper into the hypnotic state, he told me I could not open my eyes, that it was as if they were glued shut. I recall that I tried to open them and could not.

Potter then told me that on the count of three, I would be able to open my eyes effortlessly. He counted to three and I opened my eyes with no trouble whatsoever. Even in the hypnotic state, I was impressed.

Potter continued taking me deeper into the hypnotic state, continually talking to me, continually helping me relax.

Next, Potter told me that the muscles of my right arm were contracting and that I was to reach high into the air with my right hand. As I reached higher and higher, my fist became tighter and tighter.

Potter continued to encourage me to "reach higher." It seemed that I was almost lifting myself out of the recliner in order to reach higher. After that, Potter had me gradually relax my arm and hand and return to my original semi-reclining position.

Two days later, I reflected on how I strained to "reach higher." The muscles in my right arm and shoulder were actually sore, as when one overexerts after a period of inactivity.

Potter then relaxed me further and took me even deeper into my subconscious.

We talked about the years in reverse. He told me to visualize a calendar with the years peeling off: 1983, 1982...on back to my first grade year. He related to me some of the information I had given him before the hypnotic state.

He asked me my teacher's name and where I was sitting in the room. With his help, I was able to remember the name of the individual who was sitting behind me and the last name of the person in front of me. Before the hypnotic state, I could only remember the first name of the person in front of me.

After a few more questions about the class and classroom, we gradually came back to the present and he brought me out of the hypnotic state. I felt great. I had been so relaxed it was almost as if I had taken a short, refreshing nap.

Potter asked how long, off the top of my head, I thought I had been in the hypnotic state. I told him I didn't think it had been more than 10 or 15 minutes. In fact, it had been more than 30 minutes.

Maybe someday, with some help from a hypnotist, I'll get around to losing that extra 20 pounds.

Woman uses hypnosis for first childbirth

She used hypnosis to help her in the delivery of her first child and now Audrey Dawson-Ramoska claims "I won't have a baby again without hypnosis."

Ramoska, who is the secretary to the dean of the College of Home Economics, had her first child, Cassandra, in June 1982 using hypnosis.

"I worked with Greg (Potter) on a research project when he was completing his doctorate degree," Ramoska said. "I had recently read a book from the library about childbirth by hypnosis. I knew that Greg had some experience with hypnosis. I asked if he would be interested in working with me," she said.

Potter began working with Ramoska when she reached her seventh month of pregnancy.

He guided Ramoska into a relaxed state of mind by telling her to think of something relaxing and enjoyable. As she went deeper into a relaxed state, she was susceptible to his suggestions.

"I remained totally aware throughout and that surprised me. I could even hear a dog barking outside," Ramoska said.

'I won't have a baby again without hypnosis.'

Audrey Dawson-Ramoska

During hypnosis, Potter did several tests on Ramoska and told her she would not be able to open her eyes until he counted to three, Ramoska said. She opened her eyes — the suggestion had not computed with her mind.

Potter then took Ramoska deeper into a trance and had her stand, allow herself to fall backward and let him catch her. That test worked, proving she had total trust in him, she said.

The last test was a sensation test. Potter moved his finger on the back of her hand in a circular motion. He told Ramoska she was losing feeling in her hand, as though she had been given a shot of novocaine.

As he continued to talk, he told her she would feel no pain in that hand, but that when he pinched her she would feel only pressure.

"I felt the pressure on my hand as though he were pressing on it, but I had absolutely no pain. Two days later I still had a red mark where he had pinched me," Ramoska said.

In each of the seven sessions, they repeated the three tests. Potter also repeated the post-hypnotic suggestion that when her contractions came she would feel no pain, only pressure.

Potter also taught Ramoska to hypnotize herself for the delivery so she would be relaxed and would feel no pain, as he had instructed her in the post-hypnotic suggestion. However, she would still be able to time the contractions and cooperate with the delivery room staff.

To hypnotize herself, Ramoska began to count backward from 50 and was relaxed by the time she reached 25.

"I used to practice this technique in the evenings," Ramoska said. "But I always fell asleep by the time I got to 30 so I thought it wasn't working." She said she found out later that it was.

When labor began, the obstetrician gave Ramoska a local anesthetic to perform an episiotomy (the process of making a surgical incision to enlarge the birth canal).

Ramoska said the anesthetic had not had time to take effect when the doctor began the procedure, but she felt no pain, only a cold knife.

Ramoska said she felt great after Cassy's birth, not at all tired.

"That's probably because I slept between contractions. When I counted backward from 50, I was usually asleep by the time I got to 30 even when I had the contractions," she said.

Ramoska said she thinks the hypnosis may have benefited the baby as well as herself.

"Cassy slept all night from the time we brought her home. She was a very relaxed and easy-going baby," Ramoska said. "I don't know if there's a correlation (from the hypnosis) since this was our first."

Potter also gave Ramoska the post-hypnotic suggestion of rapid recovery. She water skied less than a month after delivery of her baby.

"The fact that I did aerobics through my seventh month may have helped with the delivery also, but I don't want to try having another baby without using hypnosis," Ramoska said.

Dancers display choreographic abilities

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

The Susan Warden Dancers gave Manhattan a glimpse of the outside boundaries of modern dance Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

Review

The winter concert, performed before a crowd of about 350, was a chance for company members to present their own choreography to the public. Four company members explored different choreographic techniques including pedestrian movement, minimalism, the art of spinning and dance movement based on music.

Warden introduced each dance and explained something about the artists' intentions or process. She created an informal atmosphere and a more intimate relationship between audience and dancer.

A solo by Jean Dickinson, titled "Voices (Inside My Head)," extended the intimacy further. The dance was based on movement Dickinson thinks is natural for her body. By dancing in a slip that blended into the color of her skin, Dickinson added to the exposure that was created in the dance. There were no preconceived ideas to convey and no music to distract the viewer from the honest or true movement of Dickinson's inner self.

Another piece, "Pete Repete," also was choreographed by Dickinson. In the piece she limited herself to two movement phrases and spinning. The repetition of spinning, first developed by modern dance choreographer Laura Dean, is an exercise the company began working with a year ago as a method for centering the body.

Dressed in conservative black pants, white shirts and thin dark ties, the dancers demonstrated many variations of spinning in a circle. Dickinson proved that repetition is not necessarily boring, comparing the dance to people that keep watching the same television reruns over and over again.

Mary Martin, sophomore in pre-professional business administration, described the imagery in the dance she choreographed as "slum of the soul." The dance, "Small Change," takes the viewer back in time to the gangster era. There was nothing subtle about the expression of violence, fear or sex depicted in the duet by Martin and Dickinson. In gaudy dresses with pink flowers, the women described what happened when "small change got rained on with his own .38."

"Serendipity" describes the process that Scott Smith, sophomore in electrical engineering, went through when choreographing his first piece with the Susan Warden Dancers. He stripped the dance down to very simple movements including walking, sitting and changing focus. The costumes were as stark as the choreography, a black leotard or pants and white skin.

Experimenting with minimalism in movement, Smith had the dancers sitting in folding chairs, staring at the audience as they might stare at a television screen. The house lights came up as the dance started creating a connection between the dancers and the audience, involving them in the piece.

Using no music made the dancers rely on their senses to cue their synchronized movements. Their sideways glances, smiles, and awkwardness demonstrated that the connections between the dancers on stage were real and not artificial.

"Beckoning Shapes and Shadows Dire" dealt with pyromania and the control of fire. The dancers' images appeared on stage in the flicker of a cigarette lighter or at the whim of a lighting technician who controlled what the audience would or would not see. The dance, choreographed by Scott Harlan Brownlee, was vague in intent with an unclear ending.

Warden added a new piece to the afternoon's entertainment titled "Great Voices," and set to the "Triumphal March" from "Carmen." She created cliched movement to accompany the opera voices as the singers joined or withdrew from the melody in the music. The audience, always appreciative of Warden's sense of humor, was not disappointed at this either.

Warden also completed a fourth section to her work-in-progress, "Trio," which was begun in 1982. The fourth section included all company members dancing to music by minimalist composer Steve Reich.

Warden continued the use of lifts and jumps without breaking the lyrically flowing theme of the dance. She also successfully used staccato movements in the dance without letting the movements interrupt the rhythm of the music pattern.

The concert ended with a group improvisation, the process of creating a dance spontaneously on stage. Improvisation calls for a great deal of listening both from the audio sense and the kinesthetic sense, Warden said.

Even after an afternoon of choreographed exhaustion, the dancers had artistic energy to burn. They blew air into each other's faces and other places and demonstrated their ability to interact with the Manhattan audience when improvising with a little help from friends.

Wildcat Coach Jack Hartman and official John Dabrow discuss Hartman's second half technical foul. Hartman was whistled for the technical after Alex Williams was called for basket interference. Nebraska beat the Wildcats 47-46 in Ahearn Field House Saturday afternoon.

'Huskers stun K-State

Smith tip-in pulls out win

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

It's been like a recurring nightmare.

Three previous times this season — against the University of Indiana, the University of Oklahoma and Oklahoma State University — K-State has dropped close basketball games. Saturday it happened again.

Seldom-used University of Nebraska forward Ronnie Smith tipped-in a missed shot by teammate Stan Cloudy with 7 seconds remaining to give the Cornhuskers a hard-fought, 47-46 win over K-State in Big Eight Conference action at Ahearn Field House.

Smith scored only six points — his only tallies during the conference season — for the 'Huskers, but his final bucket silenced the Ahearn crowd of 10,100 and brought a familiar ending for the K-State basketball squad. The 'Cats' last hopes died as a desperate half-court shot by guard Jim Roder — who earlier missed a one-and-one free-throw chance that the 'Huskers rebounded and drove in for the winning points — fell short as time ran out.

With the win, Nebraska evened its conference record at 3-3, including an 13-6 overall mark, while K-State remains in the Big Eight cellar with a 1-5 record and 9-10 overall.

Unlike last Wednesday against Iowa State, the 'Cats were unable to protect a lead. Against the Cyclones, K-State led by one late in the game and held on for a 75-69 win. Against Nebraska the 'Cats ran out of luck.

"We've had a lot of tough games this year against Indiana and Oklahoma, but this one ranks right up there," 'Cats forward Ben Mitchell said. "We're playing hard, but we just need to get our breaks now and then."

K-State had a chance late to put the game away. After a pair of Mitchell free throws put the 'Cats up by one, 46-45, with 1:17 left, Nebraska's Cloudy was called for traveling under the basket with 22 seconds remaining. Roder drew a foul with 17 seconds left, but he missed the front end of an one-and-one free-throw chance to open the door for Smith's last-second heroics.

"This is a tough loss for me personally, having an opportunity to ice the game like that," Roder said. "I just didn't get the job done. That's really where the blame should lie. If I had made both, we would have had a three-point lead, and we would have won the game, I think."

A double technical foul on K-State with 7 minutes left changed the momentum in the game. With the 'Cats clinging to a 40-38 lead, a shot by forward Lafayette Watkins was disallowed because of a basket interference call on center Alex Williams, who also was hit with a technical for hanging on the rim. Hartman immediately jumped off the bench to protest the call and also was slapped with a technical.

"I had a great profile on the play," K-State Coach Jack Hartman said. "The kid (Williams) didn't touch the ball — it wasn't even close."

'Husker guard David Ponce sank the two free throws following the technicals, and teammate Eric Williams later hit a follow-shot on

High-scoring women's cage team topples Nebraska 95-75

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

The high-scoring University of Nebraska Lady 'Huskers brought their fast-breaking offense to Ahearn Field House Saturday evening with one major intent — to run.

But it was K-State who would run away with the game — winning 95-75 before a crowd of 2,150.

It was win No. 15 for the Lady 'Cats, who stand 15-4 overall and 5-1 in Big Eight conference play. They share the conference lead with the University of Missouri, a 73-68 winner over the University of Oklahoma on Saturday.

The Lady 'Cats used their superior height and a running game of their own to open an 18-point lead on four different occasions in the first half, hitting all but eight of their first-half points from within a 10-foot range. A 12-foot baseline shot by Nebraska's Kelli Benson with one second remaining cut the K-State lead to 44-29 at the half.

Sophomore Jennifer Jones had a hot hand in the first half, scoring 14 of her 16 points on six-of-eight shooting from the field and a perfect two-of-two at the free-throw line. She also pulled down 11 first-half rebounds.

Although K-State was enjoying offensive success in the first half — connecting on 19 of 33 field goals for 57.6 percent — it had difficulty with a Nebraska pressing defense, which caused 15 first-half K-State mistakes. The Lady 'Cats had committed only 15 turnovers in a 73-58 victory over Iowa State University on Jan. 31.

"On our fast break, we were trying to force it (the ball), Head Coach Lynn Hickey said. "I want to take the ball down the floor quickly, and as many times as we go up and down the court, we're bound to make a few mistakes."

Nebraska had its own difficulties when it came to offense — running into a K-State man-to-man defense which held the Lady 'Huskers to a dismal 30.6 shooting percentage in the first half. Nebraska came into the contest averaging 83.6 points a contest.

K-State continued to pull away from NU following intermission, utilizing the play of sophomores Tina Dixon and Cindy Durham to increase its lead to 25 points with 13:26 remaining in the game. Dixon, a 6-foot-3 center who has seen limited action since injuring her knee earlier in the season, hit seven of eight field goals in the second half to lead all scorers with 19 points.

Durham, a 6-foot forward, came off the bench to can a career-high 15 points and grab nine rebounds. Durham's previous high was 12 points against North Texas State University.

The play of Benson and Angie Miller — plus several K-State turnovers — helped NU outscore the Lady 'Cats 12-2 within a three-minute span. Benson and Miller accounted for 11 of those 12 Nebraska points.

Five points by Dixon later helped K-State up its lead to 79-60. Nebraska closed within 12 points late in the game, but the Lady 'Cats sank eight of 10 free-throw attempts in the last 2 minutes of play to secure the 20-point victory.

K-State once again used a balance-ed scoring attack, with Dixon's 19 points, Jones' 16 and Durham's 15 leading the way. Senior Angie Bonner added 14 points, and sophomore Sheronda Jenkins chipped in with 10. Jenkins also led all players in the assists department with eight and contributed five steals to the K-State defensive effort.

The Lady 'Cats held a commanding 52-31 rebounding advantage, with Jones pacing the team with 12 caroms. Bonner grabbed 10 and Durham added nine.

"I thought everyone hustled," said Hickey of the defensive and high-scoring offensive efforts. "Nebraska worked very well and kept coming at us. But overall, we still kept everything under control."

Nebraska was led by a four-player, double-figure scoring attack, with Miller's 19 points leading the way. Stacy Imming added 18, Debra Powell hit 17 and Benson canned 10 for the Lady 'Huskers. Powell, a 5-foot-10 junior who was averaging 25 points in her last seven games, was held to only eight first-half points and ended the contest connecting on only seven of 27 field goals. Hickey credited Bonner for putting the defensive pressure on Powell.

"Angie did an excellent job on Debra Powell," Hickey said. "She (Powell) didn't beat Angie to the basket very often. I'm very pleased."

K-State next hits the road for two consecutive road contests, beginning with the University of Missouri on Wednesday for undisputed possession of first place in the Big Eight and the University of Oklahoma on Saturday. K-State defeated OU, 88-70, Jan. 21 at Ahearn Field House.

Irwin snares golf tourney playoff win

By The Associated Press

PEBBLE BEACH, Calif. — Hale Irwin, given second life when his tee shot on the last regulation hole bounced back after hitting a rock on the shoreline, birdied the second hole of a sudden-death playoff Sunday and won the 43rd Bing Crosby National Pro Am golf tournament.

Irwin defeated Canadian Jim Nelford on the second extra hole by converting a spectacular shot out of the sand.

Nelford, a left-handed putter, finished his closing round of 68 about two holes in front of Irwin and was sitting on a one-stroke lead when Hale came to the par-5 18th, which curves around the cliffs and crags of Carmel Bay and provides perhaps the most picturesque and famous of all golf's finishing holes.

Irwin had to make birdie to tie.

His tee shot seemed to remove all chances that would happen. He hooked it, the ball curving and heading for the surf-washed rocks that serve as playgrounds for seals and sea lions.

But the ball hit the rocks and — incredibly — bounced back to the fairway while Irwin raised his hands to the heavens in amazement. It was one of the luckiest bounces of all time.

He hit the flagstick with his third shot and rapped in the birdie putt that completed a round of par 72.

K-State's Darryl Bonds edges out Wichita State University's Earl Blanford, left, teammate Mark Toliver, right center, and Wichita State's Clyde Neal during a preliminary running of the 60-yard dash. Bonds and Toliver placed third and fourth, respectively, in the 60-yard dash finals of the K-State-Wichita State dual meet held Sunday in Ahearn Field House.

Wildcat track teams sweep past Wichita State

K-State's men's and women's track teams used Sunday's home dual meet against Wichita State University to better personal performances. Five K-State athletes set Ahearn Field House and K-State school records and had national qualifying times or marks.

Veryl Switzer set a field house record and qualified for nationals in the long jump with a first-place leap of 25³/₄ feet.

In the women's competition, Pinkie Suggs threw the shot 49-feet-7¹/₂ to capture first place in the shot put competition. She also set a new school record and met the national qualifying mark.

With a finish of 4:43.1 in the mile run, Deb Pihl set an Ahearn Field House record and also qualified for nationals. Another member of the women's squad, Donna King, tied a field house record in the 60-yard dash with a time of :07.0. Rita Graves also qualified for nationals in the high jump with a finishing height of 5-feet-10¹/₂.

The K-State women captured six additional first place finishes.

Kelly Wenlock finished first in the long jump with a distance of 18-feet-8³/₄. In the 440 run, Michelle Maxey was first with a time of :57.1. The 1,000-yard run's top finisher was Anne Stadler with a time of 2:33.7 and Lauretta Miller ran the 880-yard run in 2:14.6 to capture first place for K-State.

In the women's two-mile run, Renee Williams crossed the finish line in 10:52.8. The K-State 440 relay team, composed of Wenlock, Crystal Hicks, King and Maxey, was first with a time of 4:01.4.

Besides Switzer, the men had four other top place finishes.

Andy Gillam was first in the shot put competition with a throw of 59-feet-9¹/₂. Mike Bradley out-distanced the other competitors in the 440-yard dash with a time of :48.5 — the second place finish was clocked at :50.7. Ray Mosier finished the 1000-yard run first in 2:13.1 and Jon Piles was first in 880-yard run with a time of 1:55.9. In the two-mile run, Bob Leetch lead the field and finished in 9:02.8.

the ensuing possession to give NU a 42-40 lead, climaxing a six-point, turn-around that apparently turned out to be the pivotal point in the contest.

In the first half, K-State led by as many as seven points, but not until after Nebraska jumped out to an early six-point lead. The 'Cats fought back to tie the game, 15-15, on a jumper in the lane by Williams, and they forged ahead to a 23-16 lead with three inside shots by Mitchell leading the charge.

Nebraska chipped the 'Cats lead to two points at halftime as Smith connected on a jumper with two seconds left to make the score 27-25.

Following intermission Nebraska guard Eric Williams hit a 19-foot jumper to knot the game, 29-29, which set the tone for the second half as neither team led by more than three.

Hartman was pleased with his team's defensive performance.

"Our defense played hard," he said. "We did a good job on Hoppen and on Cloudy in the second half. We just didn't block out on the boards twice late, which was critical, especially at the last."

Mitchell was the lone 'Cats team member in double-figures, scoring 16 points, while Watkins matched Elder with nine points.

The Wildcats will be on the road for two conference encounters with the University of Missouri on Wednesday and the University of Oklahoma on Saturday.

Olympic site seems peaceful

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — Yugoslavia is approaching Wednesday's opening curtain of the XIV Winter Olympics with good organization and a minimum of friction — a hockey eligibility dispute and other minor flareups here and there — but most things seem peaceful and in place.

But keep your fingers crossed. Politically and ideologically volatile, both Summer and Winter Games have been turned into a forum for an array of political causes.

Ask the Germans. In bidding for the 1972 Summer Games, they hoped to erase the memories of Berlin in 1936 when Adolf Hitler bleated the supremacy of the Aryan race, filled the squares with his goose-stepping legions and turned his back on one of the greatest heroes of them all — Jesse Owens — as the black American swept to four gold medals.

They were the "Nazi Olympics," ugly, reeking of hatred, jealously and the sounds of a war that was to destroy millions.

Thirty-six years later at Munich, the Germans organized the Games on a theme of "peace and good will," the original concept of this great sports spectacle. No nationalistic banners or slogans marred the streets — only flags of soft pastel colors.

There wasn't a gun in sight. Security men looked like beach boys in their white and light blue attire.

Smiles and cordiality replaced the bombast and arrogance of 1936.

Then, on the morning of the 10th day, after Mark Spitz had won the last of his seven gold medals in swimming, seven Arab terrorists climbed over a back fence of the Olympic Village, stormed into the Israeli headquarters and held the Israeli hostages for more than 10 hours.

The incident shocked and paralyzed the Games. Sharpshooters took positions on the roof tops. Rubber-wheeled tanks rolled beneath the stilted buildings. A hot line was strung between West Germany's Chancellor Willy Brandt and Israel's Prime Minister Golda Meir. Athletes watched in horror as officials openly negotiated with the masked intruders.

Shortly before midnight, the terrorists and their Israeli hostages were bussed to a helicopter and flown to an obscure airport where the hostages were supposedly to be given safe passage out. A shot rang out followed by the detonation of a hand grenade.

When the smoke cleared, the dead were counted — 11 Israelis, five of the terrorists and a tower policeman — one of the worst tragedies in sports history.

It was not the first nor perhaps the last time that the Olympic stage has been taken over for political purposes.

When the Soviet Union first entered the Games in 1952 in Helsinki, Finland, lines were immediately drawn for an ideological as well as an athletic confrontation with the United States.

The Soviet Union and the United States adopted different methods of scoring how each team was doing. When the United States went ahead, the Soviets would change systems. By their counting, the Soviets won. The U.S. scoreboard showed the Americans ahead.

In 1968, racial tensions in the United States accompanied the U.S. team to Mexico City. Two American black medalists, Tommie Smith and John Carlos, stomped the stadium by raising black-gloved salutes on the victory stand.

For a tense period, a walkout was threatened by all black members of the U.S. team. The intercession of Jesse Owens prevented it.

South Africa, now barred because of its failure to field mixed teams, has been a source of almost constant racial turmoil. Thirty-seven African nations boycotted the 1976 Montreal Games because New Zealand played host to a South African rugby team. Rugby is not an Olympic sport.

The United States led a widespread boycott of the 1980 Games in Moscow because of the Soviet's incursion into Afghanistan.

Yugoslavia has managed to overcome these problems. The housing is excellent. There is space for the celebrities and the Plain Joes. The villages for both athletes and press are spartan but meticulously clean. Buses are running on time. The food is good.

KU socks Shockers with first-half surge

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — As far as Kansas fans are concerned, it was worth the wait.

In the first regular season meeting since 1965, the Kansas Jayhawks took charge with a first half surge and went on to whip rival Wichita State 79-69 in a bitterly fought and nationally televised college basketball game Sunday.

After waiting nearly 30 years to schedule each other, the Jayhawks and Shockers are to meet in Kansas City the next two seasons and in Wichita the year after that.

"As far as I'm concerned, this is a game that should be played," said Larry Brown, Kansas' first-year head coach.

"Hearing the response of the crowd and the people, and the fact it was a sellout and on national television, I don't think anyone could argue with the success of this game."

One reason Kansas and other Big Eight schools have cited for not scheduling the Shockers is Wichita State's frequent run-ins with the NCAA. The Shockers are currently finishing a three-year probation for recruiting violations.

"You have to respect what they've done with their program," Brown said. "This is going to be a terrific rivalry and the enthusiasm will be great."

Carl Henry, Kelly Knight and Greg Dreiling triggered the Kansas surge midway through the first half as the Jayhawks cruised to the win.

The state rivals last encountered each other on the basketball court in the NCAA tournament in 1981. The renewal of the series, which had been the subject of debate among fans, alumni and state politicians, drew a packed house and a national television audience which saw the Jayhawks take control for good with a 17-5 run in the opening period.

Wichita State, falling to 11-7 overall, managed only one bucket in the 6:30 span while Knight, Henry and Dreiling helped turn a 16-13 Wichita lead into a 30-21 Jayhawk advantage.

Wichita State got no closer than five points early in the second half.

Kansas, 13-6, was led by Henry with 19 points. Knight had 16 and Dreiling, a 7-foot-1 Wichita native who spent one year with the Shockers before transferring to Kansas, finished with 14.

The victory gave Kansas a 5-1 lead in games between the two.

Hyatt technician flunks licensing exam

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A technician who played a key role on the engineering team that designed the Hyatt Regency hotel skywalks failed Missouri's engineer license test before being assigned to the hotel project, according to a published report.

In a copyright story Sunday, The Kansas City Star reported that state test results on file with the Missouri Board for Architects, Professional Engineers and Land Surveyors show that in 1975 Edward C. Jantosik, a senior technician employed by Jack D. Gillum & Associates of St. Louis, failed the written test by a wide margin.

Jantosik received a score of 56 out of a possible 100 points. A minimum grade of 70 was needed to qualify for further testing leading to a full license, state officials said.

Hotel construction documents made public after the July 1981 tragedy revealed that Jantosik reviewed, initialed and sent on for construction the final blueprints that were used to build the skywalks.

The skywalks collapse killed 114 people and injured about 200 others.

A person not licensed as an engineer may legally perform such work, but only under the close supervision of a licensed engineer. State authorities alleged last week that such supervision was not present.

On Friday Missouri Attorney General John Ashcroft, on behalf of the Missouri Board for Architects, Professional Engineers and Land Surveyors, brought a complaint of "gross negligence" against two of the Gillum firm's engineers involved in the skywalks design.

One of those engineers was Daniel M. Duncan, Jantosik's immediate superior who, according to the complaint, failed to properly supervise the work of non-engineer employees under him.

Also named in the complaint was Jack D. Gillum, principal member of the St. Louis engineering firm, now known as GCE International Inc., which still employs Jantosik.

Jantosik confirmed Saturday that he had failed the state test. He has not been retested, said Larry Grebel, an attorney for the Gillum firm, because state licensing laws — changed shortly after Jantosik took the test — call for more formal engineering education than Jantosik has.

Grebel said his clients would demand a full hearing as soon as possible. "Our clients reputations are damaged as a result of this. We want to clear the air," he said, noting that a Jackson County grand jury recently declined to issue criminal indictments in connection with the skywalks collapse.

According to Ashcroft, had the engineers "sufficiently" checked the final plans — those initiated by Jantosik, "they would have discovered that the (skywalk) connections were so grossly inadequate that they not only lacked the capacity to bear the design loads intended or to comply with the Kansas City, Missouri building code, but also were grossly inadequate to support even the weight of the bridges themselves."

But none of the engineers involved in the skywalk design process has ever acknowledged that he investigated or had the responsibility to investigate whether the skywalk construction plans initiated by Jantosik would work, according to transcripts of sworn, pre-trial testimony taken from several engineers.

Jantosik and Gillum declined to comment on Ashcroft's allegations.

But Grebel said that neither the Gillum firm nor any of its engineers or employees had any legal obligation to check whether the design in the drawings would work.

Jantosik's review, the lawyer said, was to see whether the detailed shop drawings matched more general drawings prepared by Gillum's engineers. Grebel said they did.

Lebanon's administration plunges into crisis

Militiamen demand Gemayel's resignation President renews 'unwavering' U.S. stance

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Anti-government Moslem militiamen seized most of west Beirut in furious street battles with the Lebanese army Monday and demanded the resignation of Christian President Amin Gemayel.

Lebanese Christian radio said the U.S. battleship New Jersey shelled anti-government positions in nearby hills in retaliation for a rocket attack on the U.S. Marine base at Beirut airport. The report could not be immediately confirmed.

One Marine and eight Italian soldiers in the Beirut multinational peacekeeping force were reported wounded in the fighting, which exploded across the city. The battle plunged the American-backed Gemayel administration into its worst crisis since it took office 16 months ago.

Police said at least 90 people were killed and 300 wounded in Monday's fighting, pushing the overall toll to about 160 dead since the latest round of Lebanon's intermittent civil war broke out last Thursday.

Hooded Shiite Moslem irregulars and their Druse allies drove Lebanese army units from most of their checkpoints on Moslem west Beirut's main commercial thoroughfares and residential neighborhoods.

The fierceness of the fighting was reminiscent of the 1975-76 civil war.

For the first time Shiite Moslem leader Nabih Berri called on Gemayel, a Maronite Christian, to resign.

Gemayel's Sunni Moslem prime minister, Shafik Wazzan, had resigned with his eight Cabinet members Sunday to clear the way for a national coalition Cabinet to try to end the conflict. The conflict pits the army and the Christian right-wing Phalangist militia on one side against Syrian-supported Druse and Shiite fighters on the other.

In the United States, President Reagan issued a statement Monday deploring "the actions of those who would destroy the legitimate government of Lebanon," and blaming the Syrian government for the attacks.

White House spokesman Larry Speakes said the Reagan administration hoped Gemayel "will quickly be able to form a responsible, broadly representative government." Special Middle East envoy Donald Rumsfeld and other U.S. officials held urgent talks with Gemayel at the presidential palace in suburban Baabda, Lebanese state radio said.

But Walid Jumblatt, leader of the Druse Progressive Socialist Party,

By The Associated Press

BRASILIA, Brazil — Secretary of State George P. Shultz said Monday the United States is reviewing its policy toward Lebanon in the wake of battling in the streets of Beirut and the most severe challenge yet to the government of President Amin Gemayel.

President Reagan, meanwhile, renewed his vow that America's commitment to Lebanon "remains firm and unwavering." And his spokesman, Larry Speakes, urged reporters "not to read anything" into Shultz' statements.

"There's been no change in the U.S. position as regards the multinational force," Speakes told reporters traveling with the president in Illinois.

But House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., called for removing American Marines from the Beirut International Airport and perhaps stationing them on Navy ships offshore. He said "there's no question in my mind that somewhere along the line the president will take them out. But I say why not now?"

Speakes announced that the president would meet next Monday with King Hussein of Jordan and the following day with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak to confer on Lebanon, the Middle East in general and other issues.

In Beirut, the U.S. Marine base was rocketed. In retaliation a U.S. gunship and two warplanes turned their firepower on anti-government forces. The Pentagon said one Marine was wounded at the airport.

"We are reviewing it," Shultz said of U.S. policy. He appeared to leave open the possibility of a Marine withdrawal but made no specific reference to that option.

Reagan earlier had denounced Syria as being responsible for the new outbreak of "indiscriminate killing and suffering" and renewed his vow that America's commitment to Lebanon "remains firm and unwavering."

Other officials, who insisted on anonymity, said the new crisis probably will end with much greater influence for Syria over the Lebanese government, even if Gemayel, a Washington favorite, remains in charge.

At a congressional hearing in Washington, Gen. John Vessey, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, was asked if the United States had plans to move the Marines to safety if the situation continues to deteriorate in Lebanon.

Vessey replied: "We have contingency plans to take care of our forces, yes, senator."

Second satellite failure plagues shuttle's flight

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — The space shuttle astronauts launched a satellite for Indonesia on Monday, but it ended in a useless orbit, just like its twin Westar VI launched three days earlier.

The North American Aerospace Defense Command located the Palapa B2 satellite about seven hours after its ejection from shuttle Challenger in an elliptical Earth orbit so low that it "cannot perform its mission," said Richard Brandes of Hughes Aircraft Co., which built the satellite and its twin, Westar VI.

"Two similar failures after 18 successful space firings obviously suggest a common technical problem may have existed with these two (rocket) motors," Brandes said.

The Palapa was in an orbit that was 750 miles at its high point and 172 miles at the low point, roughly the same as that of the Westar VI launched earlier for Western Union. Both satellites had been intended for an orbit 22,300 miles above Earth.

Brandes said both satellites' rocket motors apparently shut down 15 seconds early. They were intended to burn for 80 seconds.

Charles Ordahl, vice president of McDonnell Douglas Corp., which makes the $7 million rocket stages, speculated that "there was some problem with the nozzle and the motor."

He suggested that the motors may have ruptured because both "terminated and eventually snuffed (which) would indicate pressure in the motor dropped abruptly."

To cause that, he said, "would require an increase in an opening on the motor."

The government of Indonesia called the failure "a major disappointment."

Shuttle program manager Glynn Lunney expressed the same sentiments for NASA and said "it is too early to tell and unfair to speculate where the problem was, and wherever we find it to be, we hope it will be soon."

Flight Director Harold Draughon said the astronauts did not ask about the satellite and were not told of its failure.

Western Union said its satellite cost $30 million and that other expenses pushed its loss to $75 million. Presumably, the nearly identical Palapa cost about the same.

The third major failure on the trouble-plagued flight cast a pall over the most daring part of the mission, Tuesday's scheduled first spacewalk by astronauts not wearing a lifeline.

On Sunday, a $450,000 tracking balloon burst as it was being inflated.

Westar VI, launched Friday, was found two days later in a useless orbit, its systems intact. It apparently had separated from its booster, a rocket stage called a Payload Assist Module (PAM). There was no doubt Monday that the PAM burned, at least for the first one-third of its expected time.

The Palapa was ejected from Challenger's cargo bay by a spinning mechanism. After the ship moved some distance away for safety, the PAM fired.

"We saw the beginning of the burn...it looked good," mission specialist Robert Stewart reported after the rocket fired. "It was rather bright at first."

As far as the astronauts were concerned, their part of the satellite deployment was done and they could concentrate on Tuesday's showstopper: the jet-propelled excursion into space by Bruce McCandless and Stewart. They will be the first humans to venture into the void with no rope to keep them from going too far.

McCandless, 46, and Stewart, 41, will have their backs to the black of the universe looking down on their spaceship framed against the spinning Earth. What they see will be relayed to the ground by television cameras attached to their helmets.

Their colleagues on the shuttle, Vance Brand, Robert Gibson and Ronald McNair will be watching, ready to fly the ship to their rescue should things go awry. The spacemen will always be facing the shuttle and be in its view.

Only twice before have astronauts ventured out of the shuttle, but each time they were tethered to the cargo bay by a nylon cord. The spacemen of an earlier age — in the days of Gemini, Apollo and Skylab — were supplied by air hoses while they were outside. On the moon, of course, there was enough gravity — one sixth that of Earth — so that the astronauts didn't need tethers.

Tuesday's five-hour adventure begins at 7:15 a.m. EST when McCandless opens the door to Challenger's cargo bay. He and Stewart, clad in pressure suits, will climb out and step into chair-like backpacks called MMU's — Manned Maneuvering Units.

Hand controllers on the rigid arms of the MMU's command combinations of 24 nitrogen jets to move and stop the astronauts.

McCandless, wearing equipment that weighs 700 pounds on Earth, will leave the cargo bay first, moving above and behind the shuttle.

While McCandless is out, Stewart will attach a docking device to a storage box and McCandless will fly back to attach himself to it. The exercise is practice for the 11th shuttle flight in April when astronauts wearing similar equipment will try to retrieve a malfunctioning satellite and bring it into the cargo bay for repair.

Voter reward draws candidate debate

By MIKE TURNER
Government Editor

A decision to give $50 to the residence hall with the best voter turnout in Wednesday's student elections drew mixed reactions from candidates for student body president in a debate Monday at Putnam Hall.

Ken Heinz, junior in computer science and a residence hall resident, said the Association of Residence Halls decision might help his chances of winning the election. Heinz said he thinks the residence halls need a stronger voice in student government.

However, a person should not vote for a candidate only because the candidate comes from a residence hall, Heinz said.

Dana Hawkins, senior in journalism and mass communications, said the action bothers her because "it sets a very dangerous precedent."

"It's obviously not going to help my campaign because I'm not from a residence hall," Hawkins said.

A student body president represents the entire University. It would be preferable to have a student body president who has lived in several housing systems within the University, Hawkins said. She said she has lived in both residence hall and Greek systems.

Tracy Turner, junior in economics, said, "I'm all for anything that increases voter turnout."

Turner said he could see no reason to keep voting restricted to the Union. The basement of Farrell Library would be much closer to the residence halls and would be more of a central location, he said.

Eddie Rodriguez, junior in pre-law, said he agreed it is important to increase voter turnout.

Only 2,300 students turned out to vote last year, Rodriguez said. "As Former ambassador charges lack of disclosure

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An ex-U.S. ambassador to El Salvador charged Monday that the Reagan administration had "created" rightist Salvadoran leader Roberto D'Aubuisson as a serious presidential candidate by concealing evidence tying him to "death squads."

"How can people cast a free vote if vital information is denied them?" asked former Ambassador Robert E. White about El Salvador's March 25 elections in which D'Aubuisson is a leading contender.

In sworn testimony before the House Foreign Affairs subcommittee on Latin America, White also disclosed the names of six Miami-based Salvadoran exiles who he alleged have financed and directed rightist "death squads" in El Salvador.

White's allegations came under sharp attack from committee Republicans.

Rep. Gerald Solomon, R-N.Y., asked the former ambassador if he might not be "the victim of misinformation" and whether the United States has the right to pick a nation's leader just because it objects to his morals.

"Should we ask (Soviet Premier Yuri) Andropov to resign because he was head of the KGB?" remarked Solomon.

"Our dollars don't go to support Andropov," answered White, referring to U.S. military aid to El Salvador's rightist government in its war with leftist guerrillas.

Last week, White, now a professor at Simmons College in Boston, accused the administration of concealing evidence that D'Aubuisson arranged a lottery to pick the military officer who would have the "honor" of assassinating El Salvador's Roman Catholic Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero, who was gunned down March 24, 1980, while saying Mass.

"The Reagan White House took on a great responsibility when it chose to conceal the identity of the Ar-said in a statement issued Monday in Damascus, Syria, that any political settlement with Gemayel's government was "impossible." He also said the president's resignation was necessary to solve the country's crisis.

Both Jumblatt and Berri accused the 42-year-old president of helping the Phalange Party of his father, Pierre Gemayel, to dominate the army and the government.

At the root of Lebanon's unending conflict is the demand by the Shiites, Druse and other non-Christian communities — comprising the majority of the population — for a greater role in running the country.

Gemayel said Sunday he was inviting the warring Moslem and Christian factions to new reconciliation talks Feb. 27 in Geneva, Switzerland. He promised sweeping reforms to give Moslems a greater say in government, and suggested he was willing to scrap Lebanon's eight-month-old troop withdrawal pact with Israel, as demanded by his opponents and their Syrian backers.

The report that the battleship New Jersey was shelling Druse positions came from the Christian "Voice of Lebanon" radio. Marine spokesman Maj. Dennis Brooks said he could not confirm it. He said the Marines had come under a heavy rocket attack about 7 p.m., after receiving heavy small-arms fire earlier in the afternoon.

The Voice of Lebanon said one American warplane had bombed a Druse militia position that was firing at the Marines. The New Jersey had fired its guns at Druse militiamen just east of the airport.

Brooks said one Marine was wounded in the afternoon attack and was evacuated for treatment aboard the amphibious assault ship Guam, part of the U.S. flotilla off Beirut.

The Marine major denied an earlier report that two other Marines guarding the U.S. and British embassies in west Beirut had been wounded.

The Italian Defense Ministry announced in Rome that eight Italian peacekeeping troops were wounded by grenade blasts during the fighting around the Italian headquarters near the Chatilla and Sabra Palestinian refugee camps.

'Phenomenal' adviser merits scholarship winners' praise

By CARA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

K-State has had a total of five Truman Scholarship winners, and Harvard and Yale are the only other schools which have had two consecutive winners in the last two years.

Many of the local winners attribute their scholarship success to Nancy Twiss, academic adviser and faculty representative for both the Truman and Marshall scholarships.

"Mrs. Twiss is really phenomenal. I don't think there are many other campuses that have someone who puts in that much time. I feel she is the reason we are up with Harvard and Yale with this award," Dave Carlin, senior in pre-law, said. Carlin was the 1982 winner of the Kansas Truman Scholarship.

Set up as the official federal memorial for former President Harry Truman, the scholarship provides $5,000 per year for four years to the winners. An individual becomes eligible for application in their sophomore year, and the financial award lasts for two years each of undergraduate education and graduate school.

Although only one Truman Scholarship is awarded per state, there also are 50 Truman Scholarships awarded at large because of the larger number of students in some states.

The candidates for the Truman Scholarship must be students planning a career in government service at the local, state or national level.

Applications for the scholarship are reviewed by a committee, and some applicants are selected for personal interviews. From these interviews, Truman Scholarship candidates are chosen. The candidates who become finalists in the contest then practice mock interviews in preparation for their final one.

"One of the keys to winning is the preparation involved. The rigorous training includes mock interviews, essay reviews and three practice interviews. K-State has established a record of success, I feel largely due to our adviser Nancy Twiss," said Brad Russell, junior in pre-law and the 1983 Kansas Truman Scholarship winner.

"The scholarship was formed in 1975. It is a new award. They (the Truman Foundation) have yet to see how the graduates turn out," Tracy Turner, junior in economics, said. Turner is the 1983 Truman Scholar at large.

"So far, one (graduate) is serving as a clerk for a Supreme Court justice, some are in prestigious law firms on Wall Street and some have even landed in their career choice," he said.

Another honor, the 1984 Marshall Scholarship, has also gone to a K-State student. Dan Robison, senior in natural resources management, was the recipient.

"I couldn't have done it with someone less motivated than Mrs. Twiss. She made me get a lot done that I wouldn't have on my own," Robison said.

The Marshall Scholarship is given by the United Kingdom. The award was established in appreciation for the economic assistance provided by the United States to aid the recovery of Britain and other European countries after World War II.

Robison's scholarship will include two academic years of study at any university in the United Kingdom and financial support of about $16,000 per year.

"In the interviews (for the Marshall Scholarship), the professors question you and won't let you off the hook until you give an answer," Robison said. "To apply for the Truman, you have to write a 600-word essay. You think you're through and she (Twiss) thinks you're just starting. Mrs. Twiss made me sit down and put my ideas in words and put that through a dozen drafts."

Robison, who also has been a past candidate for the Truman Scholarship, said, "I spent approximately 40 hours with Twiss over a period of five weeks."

The interviewing committees look for poise and conviction, Twiss said. They look for poise because they (candidates) are going through a high-pressure interview and conviction because they look not only for involvement, but also character — people who are willing to uphold unpopular views.

"The candidates exhibit a personal integrity and an evidence of conscience that is brought to bear in both the individual's life and in the community — sometimes a world community," said Twiss, who is also an instructor of arts and sciences.

"The Truman and Marshall people have said for several years that the best candidates come from the Midwest. I think possibly if we could nominate more, we might have more winners," Twiss said.

Commission to discuss tax-financing issue

A proposal before the Kansas Legislature requiring a referendum when using tax-increment financing is to be discussed at the Manhattan City Commission meeting at 7 p.m. today in City Hall.

The referendum issue was introduced at the last regular meeting by Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood, who quoted a March 1981 downtown redevelopment newsletter that said a special vote must be taken if redevelopment results in a property-tax increase. The plan indicates that redevelopment may increase city property taxes more than 7 percent.

Commissioners also are to consider the selection of a relocation consultant to assist the city with finding new locations for businesses being displaced as a result of redevelopment. The commission also will discuss appointment of a committee to participate in interviews for a negotiator in the acquisition of downtown property.

Second reading of an ordinance amending the downtown redevelopment plan also is scheduled. The plan, approved on first reading at the Jan. 17 meeting, outlines changes made in the project over the past two years.

With Riley County's request to seal off a portion of Fifth Street to build a courthouse plaza, commissioners are to consider changing traffic flow on Fourth Street between Humboldt and Yuma streets from one-way to two-way. An ordinance closing Fifth Street is to receive a second reading. County officials have requested that it be closed by June 1. The change in traffic flow would also go into effect then.

The Shed Company is to ask commissioners to consider an ordinance annexing almost two acres of land south of Fort Riley Boulevard. The lumber firm is considering a plan to rebuild its facility as the Little Apple Lumber Company.

Campaign themes ignore issues

It all sounds like a scratched record. Throughout the campaigns which have been leading to Wednesday's student body elections, candidates have used the same posters plastered on trees, the same Collegian ads, the same prepared rhetoric to issue at each debate to make promises which have been made by every candidate in every election for years past.

The platforms presented by most of the student body presidential candidates, and supported by some senatorial candidates, are representative of the lack of knowledge and understanding of what students feel is important. Instead, they are feeble attempts to create issues out of obscurity in order to have something to debate.

Longer hours at Farrell Library, safety on campus and advising practices are not nearly as important as the quiet, yet persistent, presence of student sentiment against the coliseum or concern about the quality of education at K-State due to low faculty salaries. Even student recruitment, although important in terms of the fiscal stability of the University, should not be a prime responsibility of student government.

Yet candidates who swear eagerly that they are willing to listen to and express students' concerns have failed to address these sentiments, or have given broad generalizations as answers to questions about these areas.

Even on the "issues" they present as vital to students and the well-being of the University, candidates fail to offer creative plans for improving current situations or specifics about how these plans will work.

Although there is only one day of campaigning left, there is a new year beginning in which students can demand more than rhetoric from their representatives. Get out and vote Wednesday, and when the new leaders are elected, ask them for some innovative, specific plans and timetables for acting on your concerns.

Attack on Mondale unfounded

Within days, Ronald Reagan delivered the State of the Union address, gave Congress his proposed fiscal 1985 budget and announced his candidacy for re-election. After building such momentum, he hasn't stopped. Now he's launching an all-out attack on Walter Mondale.

Assuming the former vice president will be his rival in November, the president has accused Mondale of trying to "be all things to all people." Reagan said he thinks Mondale has "made more promises than can possibly be kept."

Furthermore, Reagan's campaign director, Edward J. Rollins, said "the Mondale machine is better than the man, the campaign is stronger than the candidate." GOP Chairman Frankahrenkopf alluded to the failure of the Jimmy Carter-Mondale team in securing the release of the Iranian hostages as an indication of Mondale's weakness as a candidate.

Reagan should realize that Mondale appeals to so many people and is endorsed by such groups as the National Organization for Women and the National Education Association because the president himself has offended a large portion of the American population. Obviously, if Reagan catered more to the majority of Americans instead of corporate business interests, Mondale would not enjoy such extensive support.

As for his remark about keeping promises, Reagan should be silent unless he can prove never to have broken a vow himself. After all, he's a politician, too.

Rollins' remark about the Mondale campaign also is illogical. Pay no mind to the fact that any major political campaign, Democrat or Republican, requires organization, personnel, planning, publicity and professionals. And Fahrenkopf's remark is a cheap shot. Carter is not running for the Democratic nomination. Mondale is — and he should be evaluated on his own merits and not those of the past administration he served.

Reagan should not expect to garner re-election support with such nonsensical remarks against one of his opponents, whether made himself or by his campaign leaders.

Mrs. Harris goes to Havana

Mrs. Harris is 83 years old, a great-grandmother from south-central Kansas. Mrs. Harris, in an important sense, is like Ronald Reagan — they both decided to do something substantial with their retirement. They are unlike in that Mrs. Harris has set "broadening her mind" as her retirement goal.

With all of the threats and accusations flying between Cuba and the United States, she decided that the Christian thing to do with her Christmas vacation would be to check out Cuba for herself.

Mrs. Harris (not her real name) has long been an observer of Latin America. "I was a Cuba-watcher long before we heard of Fidel Castro," she said. "I was thrilled when Batista was thrown out, and I watched on TV when Castro came to the United States for help."

When the opportunity arose to travel with a group of Methodist clergy and laypeople, Mrs. Harris jumped at it. She is back again, "more dead than Red," and I happen to have a copy of her travel diary.

What did Mrs. Harris find in Cuba? Of no surprise to her, she did not find the international rose garden that Castro would have us imagine. Nor was it the evil den of communist empire builders as Reagan would have us believe.

Of the manner in which visitors were handled she said, "We did lots of sightseeing and heard lots of propaganda. Most of it I was familiar with." They had a meeting with leaders of the Cuban Women's Federation and one with leaders of the Small Farmers movement. At one of the meetings they learned about the Committee for Defense of the Revolution.

"I am sure that none of us would want the CDR looking after us," Mrs. Harris wrote. "A call is prompted by failure of a pregnant woman to see her doctor. After a baby is born, regular visits to a clinic are required. An unexcused absence from school prompts a call."

I understand that the propaganda they heard was similar to the speech Castro gave recently for the 25th anniversary of the Cuban revolution. The improvements in health care and education were emphasized. Cuba has a high number of doctors, and health care is universally available. Illiteracy has been nearly eliminated, and Cubans on the average are educated to junior high level. These advantages are not found in the rest of the Caribbean nor in much of the Third World.

That much is true. What is not mentioned is the food rationing that has long been part of daily Cuban life. Nor, that in spite of Marxist doctrine, Cuba has an economy that depends largely on one crop — sugar (a cash crop at that). As in other countries, they have a huge foreign debt — around $12 billion for a country with a population of 9.8 million. This is in spite of a yearly $4 billion subsidy from the Soviet Union. Nor is any reference made to the curtailed liberties that Mrs. Harris herself would find difficult to swallow.

Not that Cuba or Castro has a monopoly on "propaganda." Reagan's "standing tall" address was equally heavy on his administration's "accomplishments," and equally light on its mistakes.

But the principal intention of Mrs. Harris' group was to meet with Christian leaders and to visit churches to see how they were faring in Cuba. "We met with several pastors. Their opinions were divided, for instance, on whether being a church member was a disadvantage on the job or (for) getting into the university. We met a Baptist pastor who has two daughters, one in medical school. At least the church is alive.

DAN ROBISON

The Methodist bishop seemed optimistic."

What struck me about her accounts was how much we have in common with the Cubans. We are humans — we have mothers and fathers and they, in turn, have sons and daughters. The mothers all want a good future for their children. They have, as we do, a difference of opinion on what constitutes the desirable future, and how to go about obtaining it. There are Christians and there are doctrinaire Marxists.

Cuba and the United States have many problems in common: cash-crop surpluses, labor surpluses and a huge national debt, to name a few. We both have leaders who insist on diverting too many of our resources to military purposes. However, the leaders' excuses for the military buildups are the same: protection from an evil, belligerent neighbor that is only 90 miles away. Or as Castro pointed out, "Ninety millimeters if the land occupied by Guantanamo Bay is taken into consideration."

Neither side automatically wants war, yet we are both told that each country desires to see the demise of the other. And both of our foreign policies are built on that premise.

Castro calls for an "end to capitalist imperialism." And he equips an army 153,000 soldiers strong. Reagan has vowed to see communism left on the "ash-heap of history." And we pour millions of dollars into Central America to prop up repressive regimes allegedly undermined by Cuba. Where is the end to this?

The more we arm, the more Cuba feels threatened. The more they arm in response, the more Reagan apparently feels threatened, and so on.

Mrs. Harris is of the opinion that to get along either as persons or as nations, we must maximize our similarities and minimize our differences. The spirit she has at 83 is the spirit we need as a country — to learn more about "the enemy" rather than to seek to destroy it. The alternative is to blindly make and shake weapons until the final blast.

Editor,

I was astonished by your choice of a front page photograph in the Feb. 2 Collegian. Elections are coming up this Wednesday for some very important positions, and many students have yet to decide on a candidate. I am one of those students.

The photo, which clearly depicted four students posting Tracy Turner signs on a tree, was completely out of line. It could not have been any clearer or centered any better if it were a paid advertisement. The Collegian has a critical responsibility to the students of K-State, and a photo like that one on the front page makes a joke of your duty. If the students do not know one of the presidential candidates personally, they rely almost entirely on the Collegian to provide information about the candidates and their platforms. Where were the pictures for Ken Heinz, Dana Hawkins or Eddie Rodriguez? The photo appeared to me to be an endorsement for Turner by the Collegian.

I only hope that the students who have not made up their minds yet will not vote for a candidate Wednesday simply because they have seen that name in the Collegian the most often.

Computer not education remedy

WASHINGTON — "For the first time in his life, he's struggling." So began a recent commercial for computers that proves nothing about the efficacy of computers and everything about the bad taste of the advertising industry.

The "he" is a boy of cosmic cuteness, standing perplexed before a blackboard doing math problems. He is looking downtrodden, glum, which as far as I'm concerned is the appropriate demeanor for math, and we are told what we can easily see: He is having a hard time at it.

The remedy? A computer, of course. He gets one and next we see a chortling, happy, well-adjusted kid, clearly on his way to success in math and everything else. He sits before a computer screen just rejoicing in how much fun awful arithmetic can be. The message? If you love your kid, you will get him or her a computer.

As commercials go, this was about as low as they get. It preys on parental guilt and the fear that the future will belong to those who are, as the expression goes, computer literate — surely a contradiction in terms. As if to prove what happens, there was yet another commercial about a young man who prematurely returns from college, a flunk-out because he knew nothing about computers. He comes home by train, proving his ignorance is boundless.

The advertisers, as usual, have their fingers on the pulse of the public. Anxiety about computers turns up in just about every public opinion poll, or for that matter, any conversation with a cab driver. A Louis Harris poll, for instance, shows great apprehension about both computers and their adjunct, the robot. At the same time that the public welcomes these innovations, it recognizes that they mean a loss of jobs — some of them forever.

But if a columnist is entitled to a guess, there is another kind of anxiety fueling the computer boom and it has little to do with jobs. That anxiety is the one parents have for children who come home from school and find no adult there — or, almost worse, an adult so fagged out by a day at the office that he should or could just as well not be there.

What is most interesting about the commercial about the struggling kid is that neither when he stands perplexed before the blackboard nor when he sits before the computer is there an adult around — neither a parent nor a teacher. The kid is "struggling" in a word bereft of adults, a world in which adults are either too expensive (school) or too busy (home) to take time with him.

This computer then is nothing less than a baby-sitter cum tutor. It is an electronic pacifier that will help junior with his homework when both parents are either at work or too fatigued when at home to grapple with their child's homework. The anxiety that the computer alleviates has only partly to do with a child's learning difficulties. It also has to do with the trouble working parents have in finding the time to deal with their child's difficulty.

If that is the case, then the computer will turn out to be nothing more than a gussied-up TV set. Time was when television was going to be the Great Teacher, when kids would be taught by it in the classroom and they would return home to even more instruction. Instead, they come home to soap operas; not a whole generation of kids know all there is to know about adultery — and little else.

RICHARD COHEN

A computer will not teach adultery, but there is little reason to think that by itself it will teach motivation or discipline. It will hardly sit the kid down and make him or her work, and it will not dial the phone to call the office if junior decides his homework can wait, but the TV cannot. As wonderful as the tutorial programs are, they are no substitute for either teacher or parent — especially if the learning is coming hard.

So back to the kid in the commercial. Not for the last time in his life is he struggling — computer or no computer. In fact, we're all struggling — struggling both at our jobs and at parenting and knowing, sometimes reluctantly, that there really is a "device" for struggling children. Most homes and schools already have one. It's called an adult. It's programmed to teach.

chbishop Romero's murderer and not to use the evidence...to write 'finish' to the political fortunes of...Roberto D'Aubuisson," White reiterated Monday.

Denying a coverup, administration officials say all relevant information had been given to Congress and that the evidence against D'Aubuisson is not conclusive. D'Aubuisson has denied involvement in the still-unresolved assassination of Romero, who was considered by Salvadoran rightists to be sympathetic to the left.

In his testimony Monday, White elaborated on his charges against D'Aubuisson, citing the former intelligence officer's ouster from the military in 1979 for human rights abuses, evidence tying D'Aubuisson associates to attacks on the U.S. embassy, and documents captured from him in 1980 showing that he was stockpiling weapons.

White said that based on this evidence, the Carter administration classified D'Aubuisson a terrorist and denied him a visa to come to the United States.

"Shortly after President Reagan took office, this administration overturned this policy and began the process of rehabilitating ex-Maj. D'Aubuisson," White said. "No longer was he a pariah....In a very real sense, the Reagan administration created Roberto D'Aubuisson the political leader."

While the Reagan administration did grant D'Aubuisson a visa to enter the United States, it reversed that policy last Nov. 29, when it barred him along with leftist Nicaraguan leader Tomas Borge.

White also testified that a reliable source close to the Salvadoran exiles outlined their alleged "death squad" activities to the U.S. Embassy in San Salvador in January 1981 and that the information was sent to Washington shortly before he was fired as ambassador by Reagan.

White said the source identified the six as Enrique Viera Altamirano, publisher of the conservative newspaper Diaria de Hoy; Luis Escalante; Arturo Muyschondt; Robert Edgardo Daglio; and "the Salaverria brothers, probably Julio and Juan Ricardo."

Muyschondt said he would fly to Washington Wednesday to dispute the charge, which he termed "totally false." Muyschondt is a banker whose family has holdings in cotton and dairy cattle in El Salvador.

I see it, the more, the merrier," he said.

In discussing their goals for student government, all candidates agreed on the basic issues. However, each has a different top priority.

Heinz said his most important goal is to increase campus safety through increased lighting in various places around campus.

University Facilities has said they have no money to spend on lighting, Heinz said. However, Chet Peters, vice president for student affairs, indicated the K-State Alumni Association has money available from senior class gifts, he said.

Hawkins said her most important goal is to truly represent the students. She said she would try a variety of methods to increase student awareness of issues.

Hawkins said she would run a bi-monthly column in the Collegian and would try to establish a bi-monthly call-in program on KSDB-FM where she and the Student Senate chairperson would address topical issues.

Turner said his top priority is to organize student recruitment efforts at K-State through a coordinating council.

Student enrollment is currently down by approximately 200 students and is projected to decrease until 1988. K-State will have many financial problems in the future if we do not attract more students, Turner said.

Rodriguez said he considers it most important to obtain accreditation for Farrell Library through the Association of Research Libraries. He said a good library would be crucial in attracting new students.

Rodriguez said he is the only candidate to have talked with Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, about improving library services.

Financial woes threaten existence of universities attended by blacks

By The College Press Service

"Without a doubt, black universities are facing some of the most serious times they have ever faced," said Bill Rouselle, public relations director of "Black Collegian" magazine.

Victimized by the success of breaking the color barriers at larger schools, wracked by the funding problems common to all small schools, and punished by certain Reagan administration policies, predominantly black colleges have almost universally reported they are facing a crisis.

At least six black schools face financial problems which could cause them to close.

Most prominently, Fisk University at Nashville, Tenn., one of the nation's most respected black schools, recently spent almost the last of its $14 million endowment, drained by past mismanagement and hard economic times. The non-stop pressure and hustling for funds to get the school through week to week convinced the school's president to resign in exhaustion.

Bishop College at Dallas, Texas, now owes the U.S. Department of Education $7 million in housing loans, $2 million of which must be repaid by June 1985.

The department already forgave a Bishop loan of $3.5 million, said department comptroller Ralph Olmo.

The schools may join a lengthening list of black colleges that have not survived the last decade. The 264 predominantly black colleges of 1974 have dwindled to a mere 105, said Craig Shelton, a student at Xavier University of Cincinnati, Ohio, who also leads the National Organization of Black University and College Students (NOBUCS).

One reason for the fatality rate is the success in integrating other schools.

"Black institutions started because black students couldn't go anywhere else," said Bonnie Gillespie, a senior fellow at Howard University's Institute for the Study of Educational Policy.

"That reason is no longer true," he said. "Black students have other opportunities and they are taking advantage of them."

But the fatality rate is accelerating because of the recent recession and some Reagan administration policies.

Black colleges are suffering some of the same financial problems confronting other small, liberal arts institutions as the college-aged population declines and costs rise.

The black schools, however, have fewer resources and smaller endowments with which to "reposition" themselves to recruit non-traditional students.

Black students also are more sensitive to financial aid policy changes than other students.

"Many black students have not gone to school because they heard about Reagan's proposed cuts in financial aid, and they don't think there's much of a chance for them," Howard Gillespie said.

The Reagan administration, however, raised federal funding of historically black colleges by 3.5 percent last year.

But the money went to the black schools which have the financial resources already, Rouselle said.

Other small schools have been dipping into money provided under the Title III program, established to aid historically black colleges and other developing institutions.

Black colleges' percentage of total Title III appropriations dropped from 55 percent in 1978 to 38 percent in 1983.

"It follows the general trend in the country right now of almost putting civil rights on the back burner, indeed, of turning off the burner altogether," Rouselle said.

HAWKINS FOR PRESIDENT

Student Body President

DANA HAWKINS

There seems to be a basic consensus among the candidates for student body president concerning the major issues of the campaign: library funding, student advising and attracting and retaining students at the University. Thus, the key issue of this campaign is who is the most qualified to deal with these concerns.

One measure of each candidate's qualifications is that person's ability to act as a liaison between legislators, administration, faculty and students. For me, this is an area of particular strength. My service as a full-time staff intern with the Associated Students of Kansas during the last legislative session is representative of this strength.

The most difficult and important aspect of the student body president's duties is maintaining contact with and thus providing true representation for the diverse group of students at K-State.

KEN HEINZ

I believe the best recruiter we have is a satisfied K-Stater. Therefore, the most important issues of this election are issues which are directed toward the student.

I am definitely in favor of improved campus safety in the form of more adequate campus lighting. I also advocate later library hours to offer the student a late-night place to study. Furthermore, I am concerned with the inadequacy of some of our college's advising systems and will work closely with the administration to see improvements made.

In order for any student leader to voice student concerns, there must be effective communication. I will do my best to accomplish this through seminars with student leaders and visitations to living groups and campus organizations.

EDDIE RODRIGUEZ

Decreasing enrollment requires someone with recruitment experience, which I have. Advising should be streamlined to aid in student retention. By becoming members of the Association of Research Libraries, our library will get the respect it deserves. Library hours should be increased. I am the only candidate to have met with Dean Hobrock on this issue. We need foot patrols, and a program to teach students how to use the emergency phones on campus to increase campus safety. Specific ideas for the future and successful experience from the past equal leadership. I have both. Listen closely to the answers and look carefully at the records. Your vote can make a difference. So, use it wisely and make it count! It's your right as a student.

TRACY TURNER

If there is anything we have heard enough of in student government, it is the phrase, "Let's look into that," or, "I'll check the possibility of..." That is why I am emphasizing a set of specific proposals that offer the students of this University a clear choice. The problems facing us are not mysterious or undiscovered; we need to attract quality students in an era of declining enrollments, and we need to create an atmosphere conducive to study. These goals will not be achieved by a lot of empty phrases or hollow promises, but by realistically defining some tangible solutions we can act upon. Above all, make your vote count. Elect the candidate you feel can best live up to his or her promises.

University elections to be Wednesday

All voting for the K-State student body elections will take place from 7:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. Wednesday in the Union. A table for voting also will be available from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. in the Veterinary Medicine Complex.

All students must present a valid student ID when voting.

Students may vote for one student body president candidate, four Board of Student Publications candidates and the number of Student Senate candidates designated for their college.

Students may vote for a write-in candidate by filling in the WI bubble in the top right-hand corner of the voting ballot. The first and last name of the candidate and the appropriate office must be printed on the back of the ballot.

Absentee ballots are available today in the Student Governing Services office in the Union for students who are unable to vote on Wednesday. A valid student ID must be presented by those who wish to use absentee ballots.

The office of student body president has four candidates running for one position. The College of Agriculture has 14 candidates running for six positions.

The following candidates failed to turn in soapbox statements.

College of Agriculture
Mark Davidson
Daniel VanLeeuwen

College of Agriculture

KELLI ANDERSON

Agriculture is Kansas' No. 1 industry. Representation in Student Senate should reflect this fact. As student senators, there is a responsibility to be a voice for your constituents and to further emphasize their college on a University-wide level. By being familiar with senate, involved with several agriculture clubs, and having an interest and enthusiasm about agriculture and political issues concerning agriculture, I feel I am qualified to represent the agriculture student in senate.

More funding for judging teams and better communication between senate, Ag Student Council and students have been the two major issues in this campaign. In office, I will accentuate more communication and accelerate better funding for judging teams.

STEVE ANGERMAYER

The College of Agriculture is important to me, and for this reason I am seeking a Student Senate position. There are many opportunities and challenges for you. But working together with concerned minds and sincere effort, we can make our college the best it can be.

I am interested in forming an Agriculture Judging Council which would go straight to senate for funding. But I also feel we must seek funding through industry support. Weber Hall renovation is also very important to agriculture students, which goes hand-in-hand with the interest to get the north side of campus more involved with the University.

SCOTT BARROWS

Hello Aggies, it's election time again and guess who is running for agriculture student senator? You guessed it! This next year the work load for agriculture senator becomes more and more important as Weber Hall renovation is starting to take place and we, as students, keep paying higher enrollment fees. The judging teams are at an all-time high in recent years, and agriculture continues to be the No. 1 industry in the state of Kansas.

Being a senior with my goals set on a degree in animal science and industry, I feel we must step forward and be heard. Communication is the real key to success, as well as being actively involved with you to listen to your needs and tasks that must be pushed through senate in the upcoming year.

BRIAN BOWERS

Having been in the College of Agriculture and living in the residence halls for four years, I have seen some problems that need to be considered by student government. In agriculture, I feel the judging teams should be allocated funds under tentative allocations and not through special allocations. Also, the renovation of Weber Hall should be top priority of Student Senate. The senate should work toward convincing the Kansas Legislature that total renovation of that building should start as soon as possible. In the residence halls I see large numbers of younger students who have the feeling they have no control over what is happening within the University. I would encourage programs geared to getting younger students involved in student government.

MARK JIRAK

This election is not one of issues, but rather, one of students who will address and represent the issues for the upcoming senate year. In the College of Agriculture it is especially pertinent to elect student senators who will serve effectively. This is because we are losing a senate seat due to dropping enrollment in our college. The senators elected should have a strong desire to serve, be qualified and be able to listen. The last quality may well be the most important, because an open channel of communication must exist between students and senators if the College of Agriculture and K-State are to progress. It is my hope that you, the agriculture students, will elect the "qualified progressive leadership" we need. Thank you.

LONNIE "CHUCK" KLINE

K-State has achieved an outstanding reputation as one of the leading agricultural colleges in the nation. Success is achieved through excellent staff and research. My job as agriculture student senator will be to provide any student the opportunity for higher agricultural education and to maintain and polish the outstanding reputation of agriculture at K-State. My goals to achieve this will be to provide funding for agricultural buildings and production research. I also would like to extend library hours for further research by graduates and undergraduates, along with working on increasing enrollment in the College of Agriculture for receiving our share of necessary funding. And finally, I'd like to give students a more powerful hand in academic and student affairs, along with communication with student government.

TIM LUGINSLAND

My desire for more involvement at K-State has led me to run for student senator from the College of Agriculture. My name is Tim Luginsland and I'm a junior in agricultural economics.

I feel I am educated on past and present issues of student government and, if elected, I would use my judgment for the good of agriculture students. I realize Student Senate has no direct power over the renovation of Weber Hall, but I will use my voice effectively in the possible persuasion of faster action. I'm also in favor of future funding of agricultural judging teams and will work to find alternative methods of receiving extra funds. I feel students from the north side of campus play as big a role in the operation of the University as everyone else.

BRUCE NEY

I'm Bruce Ney, a sophomore in agricultural journalism and a candidate for agriculture student senator. Due to the loss of one agriculture senator seat in the upcoming Student Senate, I believe it is more important than ever that students in the College of Agriculture elect a team of senators who can work together effectively and can communicate the problems facing our college to senators representing the other colleges here at K-State. Hopefully, this will allow solutions to be reached that will be beneficial to all students. I believe that if elected, I can and will be able to work with any of the other agriculture senator candidates effectively and I will be able to communicate the problems facing agriculture students and organizations clearly to other senators.

MARK STENSTROM

As a student in the College of Agriculture at K-State, I see several key problems facing our college. Among them are decreased enrollment, the need for renovation and improvement of currently inadequate facilities, cutbacks in spending and the loss of one Student Senate seat. Our college has a great tradition of leadership which must be maintained in the face of these problems. I feel I am the person to continue this leadership. With the loss of a senate position, we need leaders to represent our college with a strong voice. We need to show the University, through senate, just how important are our needs as a college. After all, K-State is a land-grant university whose deep foundations in agriculture are world-renowned.

JIM STERN

The duties of Student Senate cannot be taken lightly. If elected senator, I would strive to represent, serve and work toward improving the College of Agriculture. To properly represent the college, a senator must be well-informed and capable of cooperating with and communicating back from senate. Decreased enrollment, fewer funds available for agricultural activities, and the ever-present problem of student/senator communication are all reasons why it is vital that the college is well-represented in senate. As a junior working toward a dual degree in agricultural economics and feed science, I am prepared to serve in senate. I have been very active in the college's activities and organizations and feel I can give the commitment and determination of an agricultural senator.

KEITH WESTERVELT

Why would Keith Westervelt desire another term as student senator, you ask? The answer to this question is quite simple. Throughout this past semester, I have enjoyed the chance to serve you, the students of the College of Agriculture, as one of your seven senators. I have watched and hopefully helped the College of Agriculture as much as possible. During my past term, the senators got additional funds for the judging teams as well as trying to resolve the communication problem that exists between the senators and the students. If re-elected, I plan to shorten this communication gap even more and try a new and different method, such as a judging team council, to allocate funds for our nationally recognized judging teams.

FRED ZILLINGER II

How serious are this year's candidates? There are many candidates who haven't bothered with campaigning or even taken time to put up posters.

Of the 14 candidates on the ballot for Agriculture senator, only a few have taken the time to speak to the students. These few candidates have visited departmental club meetings and have actively campaigned to share their views and concerns.

Voters, keep in mind that it will be those candidates who care enough to communicate with the students and who will work hardest for the College of Agriculture in Student Senate. I am one of those candidates. I am serious about senate, and I am dedicated to hard work and new ideas so that the goals of the College of Agriculture can be met in the coming year.

College of Arts and Sciences

JOHN CARRASCO

If you've sat in a classroom that resembled an oven, and were thankful that a professor brought a fan, you and I have the same concerns. If you've felt departments could use more support in providing your professors and instructors more of what they need so we can benefit more from their knowledge, you and I have the same concerns. These concerns we share are just a few of the many issues that affect College of Arts and Sciences students and the University as a whole. Student Senate needs a broader perspective to more fully meet the needs of all the students at K-State. As a student senator I can work toward that goal. Wednesday's vote counts.

SHERRI HAGER

A variety of issues face K-State students this semester, including extended library hours, recruitment and retention of students and the student/adviser situation. All of the issues will directly affect us as K-State students. Student Senate has the opportunity to address these issues and to work for solutions.

As an Arts and Sciences senator, I will do my best to represent you the students.

Express your opinion and vote Feb. 8.

MARK CHARLTON

Hi, my name is Mark Charlton and I'm a sophomore in political science and international studies. Having been in the College of Arts and Sciences for almost two years has exposed me to various people with a wide variety of majors, goals and interests.

By being involved in student government at the high school level, I dealt with many different student issues that needed to be addressed. The same situation applies at the college level. At this higher level there are still a wide variety of student interests, but the result of that interest has a greater voice and impact. By utilizing that voice, students can get results in areas of special concern. One area of concern that needs special attention is the individual level of education for the student.

SCOTT COPPENBARGER

What keeps a company going? Employee satisfaction which helps increase profits. What keeps a college going? Student satisfaction which results in increased enrollment. Basic economics says as benefits increase, people will be more likely to choose an option. In relation to K-State, benefits had better equal the cost of tuition.

As a student senator, I believe if one is not satisfied, something had better be done or enrollment will continue to slip at K-State.

I'm ready to work for you, so both you and the school can benefit. If elected, I'll fulfill that responsibility effectively.

KRIS JAMES

Hello, my name is Kris James. I am a sophomore majoring in geology. I also am an active member of Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity and play varsity tennis at K-State. It's true that playing a varsity sport requires a good deal of time, but don't let that fool you. Through these experiences I have learned to budget my time wisely, which a good senator should. In addition, I have served as community service chairman for the fraternity. This taught me how to work with people toward a common goal.

With this background experience, I feel that I can serve you, the student, and represent your ideas in your best interests.

Thank you for your time, vote and support on election day.

STEVE LAWRENCE

The primary purpose of a student senator is to understand the wants, needs and concerns of his peers, so that he may act in representing their views to Student Senate. The only way this can be achieved is through constant communication. As a senator, I will strive to keep constant communication and reflect the opinions of my fellow College of Arts and Sciences students in my voting and my actions.

ANDY MARTIN

As a K-State freshmen majoring in secondary education and pre-law, I believe freshmen involvement is vital to maintaining diversity at K-State. While serving as a director for the 1984 Arts and Sciences Telefund, as a member of the K-State choir and as a McCain usher, I learned the importance of new student involvement. Despite my involvement, I was able to achieve a grade point average of 3.8 my first semester, thus making the Dean's Honor Roll. If elected, I stand committed to making next year's Student Senate one of the most effective K-State's ever had.

MATT McMILLEN

In my three years at K-State, I've been active in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Majoring in journalism and mass communications, I've had the opportunity to serve the college in several capacities. Last year I was elected to the Arts and Sciences Council, which gave me a chance to see how the college operates and the importance of communication within the college. For the last two years, I have been an Arts and Sciences Telefund director, which aided in the effort to raise money for Arts and Sciences student scholarships.

If elected, I will work more closely with the college council and seek greater communication within the college. I'd appreciate your vote on Feb. 8.

LANCE MELBER

Being a Student Senate aide for two semesters, I feel I know the issues and needs of the students at K-State. Every year Student Senate allocates funds, paid by students, of close to $900,000.

My main concern is to see that every group representing the students is allocated their fair share. Being a senior and majoring in computer science, I feel my opinion will meet your needs.

One goal I feel should be accomplished is paving the road to the L.P. Washburn Recreational Complex.

With your vote these things are not far from being reality.

LINDA MELDRUM

A student senator plays an important role in our student government at K-State. Our student government makes decisions that affect all K-State students. I feel it is important to vote for a student who is concerned with these decisions and cares enough to make a stand.

I care about K-State students, faculty and administrators. I will work with people in all three of these areas to make the best decisions. I want to be your senator. I want to listen to your views. Make your first view count and vote on Wednesday.

MICHAEL MORGAN

To represent the College of Arts and Sciences and the students on the University level is a great challenge and will take a lot of responsibility. As a student, I realize there is a need for sharp communications between the student body and the student government. Students definitely need to have more input and voice their opinions, ideas and needs into the campus and the University as a whole. My goal as arts and sciences senator will be to listen and concentrate on any ideas or opinions that would successfully benefit students, faculty and all of K-State.

GREG PESTINGER

Acting as a Student Senate aide and Associated Students of Kansas delegate for the past year, it has come to my attention just how lacking communications are between the students in the College of Arts and Sciences and their student senators. I feel strongly that senators should support the views of their constituents, not their own personal views. How can this be done without communication? It can't! As arts and sciences senator, it will be my top priority to get out and meet with students through visitations, telephone surveys and information tables. I will also promote and encourage student recruitment, the lifeblood of the College of Arts and Sciences. I encourage you to get out and vote Feb. 8. Thank you for your support.

KENDRA PONTE

Student government is for the students. As an Arts and Sciences senator for the past year, I have noticed a vast discrepancy with this concept and the truth behind it. Many senators act and speak on the behalf of their various constituents. It is vital that student senators communicate with the students to ensure perspicacious and responsible representation. If re-elected, I will strive to maintain open lines of communication and continue to act in the best interest of my college. I would appreciate your support on election day.

KIRK PORTEOUS

Being elected to Student Senate again this year would be a challenge. With declining enrollment meaning less dollars to allocate, I feel my experience as Finance Committee chairman would help bring some insight into the allocations process. I also will continue to work toward greater communication with the student body and toward making student government more effective.

BRYAN RILEY

In the upcoming year, there are a number of areas in which K-State needs responsible leadership. Some of these relate to education, such as improving our advising system, developing a way to rate faculty members and making the library more useful.

Other issues are equally important. Student Senate should work to assure students the best seats in our future basketball coliseum, to provide more campus lighting so there are no longer people afraid to walk alone at night and to affirm to the Kansas Legislature an adult's right to drink at the age of 18.

I feel I could be effective at representing students' views and in getting things accomplished, and for these reasons, I would appreciate your vote for Arts and Sciences senator.

SANDI SCHMIDT

My main reason for running for a Student Senate position is to get involved with student government. As a political science major, I have a great deal of interest in our governing system. And as a K-State student, I would like to get involved with decisions concerning our University. Student input is necessary before a decision can be made. As a student senator I will work to voice student opinions and concerns. Without your input, the University cannot work for you. So on Wednesday, get out and vote. Express your feelings.

LAWRENCE TSEN

Being a senator who represents 300 students is an interesting experience, especially for our college, where a student can major in almost anything from modern languages to microbiology. This contrast in majors demonstrates the unique gift we possess — diversity. While many people view this gift as a weakness, I see it as a major strength and advantage.

Yet the true power of our diversity lies in our ability to unify and concentrate our concerns into one voice. An area I see which needs our articulation is academic advising. As a student, I can visualize the problems within the advising system. As a member of the senate ad hoc committee, I can see probable solutions. I hope you will allow me to serve as the unifying factor between problems and solutions for this coming year.

College of Architecture and Design

DOUGLAS MANN

The knowledge and experience gained in having served as a student senator for the past year has strengthened my feelings about our student government. Many positive goals affecting every student have been accomplished, yet there are many goals which still must be achieved. Experienced leadership is essential in attaining desired goals, and experienced leadership is what I have to offer. I continue to be confident and excited about student government at K-State, and I feel it can make a difference for all students, if effectively utilized.

G.V. SALTS

During this past year, I have been active in student government as a Student Senate aide and have served on the senate Communications Committee. I have found that both of these experiences have proven to be quite rewarding and enjoyable.

By representing my college and continuing these activities, I feel I can become a link between our college and student government. But, I need your input on any issue which affects you or the University. I am asking for your support in the next Student Senate elections. Thank you.

THERESA BURGESS

Located in the upper right hand corner of your fee card is a student activity fee consisting of $25.25. This amounts to nearly $750,000 which is entrusted to Student Senate to allocate. The importance of the allocations made by senate is magnified with each cutback the University experiences. It is also important to upgrade our college image and faculty size. Currently, the College of Business Administration is the third largest college, soon to be second with an increasing enrollment every semester. Strength is in numbers, and if we work together these goals can be achieved. I am a concerned business student who is willing to devote the time and energy senate demands.

STEVE CASHMAN

To me, Student Senate is one of the best ways we, as students, can have the opportunity to play an active role in what's going on at K-State. I would like to serve as a student senator so the students in the College of Business Administration could have more input into things that affect them. I believe that through my past experience in student government, I am qualified to serve as a senator. If elected, I will do my best to represent the students of this University, and I am looking forward to serving in senate.

MARK DENGEL

Dear Constituents,

I would like to take this opportunity to express my thanks and concerns. I feel that by running for Student Senate, I can offer the department a broader choice of candidates. I would also like to see student government improved in a way of better representation and more student awareness of what issues are at hand. My qualifications for this position are nothing of outstanding merit. I admit I am just another student attempting to bring forth the views of my peers and those I will represent. I'm frustrated at the way senate has been operating this past year, and it is my goal to turn this University in the right direction.

BERT FROST

My interest in running for student senator from the College of Business Administration is very strong. Students concerns are essentially important on campus, and I feel I can listen to them and try to get something accomplished according to their desires. I'm willing to listen to student input, and I feel people feel comfortable when talking to me. I've been involved with various campus clubs and organizations, and feel I won't be inexperienced when carrying out the duties of a senator. Two of my main concerns are developing better advisement policies and longer library hours. With your support I feel I can be a positive, effective force for senate and the student body.

MONTE GRIFFIN

My name is Monte Griffin and I'm a junior majoring in finance. I believe there are two problems concerning the College of Business Administration. First is poor communication throughout the college, and second, the response from student senators after election. If elected, I intend to improve communication by working with the Business Council to get a "better pulse on the College of Business." Also, I will work with the various clubs to bring in speakers, and be available for questions and concerns you may have. You, as a student, are in a position to hire and fire, so to speak, your senators. All I ask is that before Feb. 8, you honestly examine all candidates, and hire the best person for the job.

DREW HERTEL

Student Senate plays an important role in many decisions that directly affect K-Staters. As your student senator, my objective will be conscientious representation. Two of the issues I am concerned about are fairness during the allocation process and improving our academic advising system. These can best be accomplished through dedication, time commitment and an open ear toward students' concerns.

With my enthusiasm for K-State, I will strive to work effectively with you, and working together, we will improve the already fine quality of the College of Business Administration. I would appreciate your vote on Wednesday.

TIM HICKERT

I am looking forward to the chance to represent the College of Business Administration in Student Senate. It is a job that requires a lot of time and effort, which I will be more than willing to give. I realize I am but one of hundreds in the business college, and it will be my duty to represent each and every one of you. Therefore, I will do my darndest to help achieve the things that will most benefit the students involved with our college. Listening to what you, the students, have to say will help enable me to do this, and as a result, make sure your voices are heard.

LARRY HINKEL

Student Senate is definitely an important part of K-State. During the allocation process last year, senate allocated $797,612.52 to the campus organizations, college councils and clubs. Since the money senate allocates comes from students' fees, it is obvious that a communication link between the student body and the student senators is vital. In addition to the allocation process, various issues and concerns pertaining to the students are channeled through senate. If given the opportunity to serve in senate, I will see that the students' views and opinions are heard and that actions will be taken on their behalf.

MARK JONES

I have been a student senator for the past two terms and feel it is a tremendous learning experience. With my involvement in many University committees, I have a broad understanding of the University, and I could use this experience to my advantage in another term as your representative.

More effective communication between senators and the people they represent is my No. 1 priority for the coming year. I will work toward implementing the best possible forms of communication and would welcome your input as the people I'm representing.

KRISTA LINDGREN

Considering the fact that Student Senate is responsible for the allocation of hundreds of thousands of dollars, it is extremely important that those elected to senator positions reflect the wishes of the student body.

If elected, it will be my major concern that student wishes are held in high regard. It will be my goal to be well-informed and able to relay that information to students.

It is the responsibility of the student to see that those elected will be worthy representatives of their colleges. I can't stress enough the importance of your vote — you really can make the difference. Please remember your student I.D., and tomorrow exercise your right to vote.

KENNETH MERCER

Fellow Students,

Having a keen desire to aid in the growth and improvement of K-State, both in its facilities and student benefits, I would like to enlist your support in my candidacy for student senator from the College of Business Administration.

In my two years thus far at K-State, I have listened to the concerns and questions posed by students and promise to continue to do so in the future. As special project director on the student body president's cabinet this past year, I have familiarized myself with the workings — and sometimes non-workings — of student government. It is my expressed hope to use this knowledge, in addition to sound reasoning and student survey, to better represent and advocate the wishes of K-State students. Thank you.

LORI ROCK

I am running for student senator from the College of Business Administration. I would like to help solve the problems facing business students, such as the insufficient number of class sections for certain courses and ailing student/adviser relations. There is a need to increase the number of class sections offered in required courses. Two examples would be the General Calculus and Linear Algebra and the computer science courses. In addition, the advising system should be strengthened to better serve students' academic needs. I would like to represent business students' views on these and other issues.

GLEN SEARS

My name is Glen Sears and I'm campaigning for election as a student senator from the College of Business Administration. It is to the concerned students and the University that I want to become an integral part in helping K-State continue in higher education. An issue I am striving to implement is the grades to be sent to you during break. Moreover, with your support in the upcoming election, I am confident that by working together we can bring about some benefits for you, the students.

SALLY TRAEGER

Communication is the key. Keeping the student informed about student government matters will be one of my primary concerns as a business senator. I am very interested in student government, but more importantly the whole student body. Since I've been a student at K-State, I've realized the increasing importance student government plays in meeting the needs of the student.

I would try my hardest to vote in the best interest of the student on all issues. I sincerely want to represent you, the student, and encourage you to exercise your right to vote.

The College of Home Economics has 4 candidates for three positions. The College of Education has three candidates for three positions.

The following candidates failed to turn in soapbox statements:

KERRY JONES

My name is Kerry Jones and I am seeking a Student Senate position from the College of Home Economics. I feel there are a great many issues in this year's campaign that need attention during the upcoming term. The library, faculty salaries, faculty advising, sidewalk lighting, declining enrollment and rising fees, to name a few. I realize, however, that no matter how hard senate works, not all of these issues will be resolved. But if I do get the chance to become a part of senate, I will do my best to make a difference. Thank you for your consideration.

BECKY MARSHALL

I am running for a seat on Student Senate from the College of Home Economics because I feel a need for an evaluation of University advisers. Each and every student deserves a competent adviser, just as they deserve a senator who will best represent them. Representation is only effective if the senator and the students have good communication. I would be there to listen to what you, the students, need and inform you of the issues. I encourage each of you to exercise your right to vote on Feb. 8.

JEANINE MEALY

Due to my three and one-half years in the College of Home Economics, I feel I am qualified to represent the college as a student senator. I have served on the Home Economics Council in the past, and have been in various interest groups within the college. As a home economics senator, I would like to see communication between senators and constituents in the College of Home Economics increased. I also would see that the college is fairly represented when funds are allocated this spring. I would appreciate your support and ideas.

College of Education

MELANIE BERBOHM

People are very important and precious to me. During my senate term last year, I became aware of many concerns of both students and professors ranging from the adjustments into our new Bluemont Hall, to advisee-adviser conflicts, to the excitement of finding a new dean. I feel my relations with faculty, students and staff are very relaxed and flexible, and my understandings of parliamentary procedure are both familiar and comfortable, but most importantly, I have the time to devote to my campus and college.

KAY DEEVER

No matter how cliché it sounds, communication and research are of the utmost importance to me. I want to see visitations, enforced through legislation, become the norm for student senators. The upcoming election has the potential to have a great impact on the student activity fee, and I do not want to see increases granted without a greater effort being put forth to find alternatives. I have learned a great deal during the past year in senate and I want to put this experience to work in the upcoming year.

GREG KROTZ

My major objective, if elected as College of Education student senator, will be to keep an effective line of communication between the students and the administration. Often, student government is the only means by which student opinions can reach the University administrators. The responsibility of transferring the opinions of the students in the College of Education and the student body to the administration is important, and I would pursue this task in a serious manner. Other than this, I can make no promises because the output of student government depends on the input of the students. Your vote would be very much appreciated.

College of Engineering

BARRETT BROMICH

My name is Barrett Bromich, but everyone calls me Brett.

I'm a freshman in the College of Engineering. While this immediately draws bad reviews, I believe it has advantages.

I still have the time required to be a good senator. I'm not trying to cram in a lot of hours so I can graduate next fall or spring. I'm also not running just to add one more thing to my resume.

Anything I accomplish while in office, I will be living with for the next four years, along with the rest of you.

What this all means is I have the time, I have the desire and I have the motive to do a good job.

I would like to ask for your support.

DIANE CHAMBLIN

I feel that student government is something that all students should be aware of, not just a select few. If elected senator representing the College of Engineering, I hope to let you, the students, know what the issues are and how you will be affected by them. More importantly, I will let the governing body know how you feel. I am taking the first step in getting involved. I hope you'll let me know what you think and also get involved by voting Feb. 8.

HARRY FOOT

As a junior in electrical engineering, I have been at K-State long enough to know the concerns and complaints of the students in the College of Engineering. The prominent complaint of most people I talk to is they don't know what Student Senate is doing. The solution to this problem is simple. If I'm elected, all anyone needs to do is contact me.

Since senate represents the students, the only way it can function properly is by input from the students. If some issue is on your mind, call me to discuss it.

Student Senate is your voice in K-State affairs — feel free to use it.

MARK GALYARDT

I am running for Student Senate for two reasons. First is my desire to have more of a say in issues that affect students, and second is to become more active in student government. I feel I am well-qualified to be a student senator. I have been representing student interests as a member of the Traffic and Parking Council for the past two years. I am also an engineering ambassador for the College of Engineering. As far as some of the issues are concerned, I am in favor of trying to get library hours extended, as well as trying to get more study space for students around campus. I also feel that students deserve competent advising for the kind of money we have to spend every semester. In closing, I just want to say I am proud to be a K-Stater and I wish to serve the students the best way I can.

ROGER GARFOOT

In the last year, a lot of discussion has centered around the issue of communication between senators and students. I see this as a major problem that must be dealt with before Student Senate fully represents the students. I will consider this my primary duty, to inform students of the issues, listen to their concerns and act on them as they wish. The allocation process is the most important aspect of senate. Not every group can get the funds they want, but I will work toward an agreeable compromise. I think I can do a good job, and I hope you'll give me the opportunity to work for you.

HISHAM HAWARI

As a junior in electrical engineering, I feel that I have the experience, capability and responsibility to represent the College of Engineering and the University community as a student senator.

Effective communication between faculty and students, better hours for Farrell Library and to inform students about where their money is going are some of my main concerns.

I would effectively present the concerns of the engineering students because I believe in working to keep all channels open for students to voice their concerns through their senators.

STEVE HUMMELL

Engineers need to be involved with the student government at K-State, and I feel I can act as a successful liaison between these two. I am interested and involved in the pertinent issues on campus. I feel I have a working knowledge of these issues. With the strength of the recent issues at K-State, I feel we, as engineers, need to be represented in the University senate. In past years, the senate has voted on the coliseum referendum and the renovation of Nichols Hall, just to name a few. These issues were important to the students, and I would like to continue the tradition of representing the students effectively. I believe the students at K-State need to be well-represented in the government of our University. I feel I would be able to represent the engineers' attitude toward issues strongly and effectively.

BRYAN MILLER

My name is Bryan Miller, and I am running for an engineering senator spot. I realize how important being a senator is, and I believe I can serve the students well. During the coming year, many issues will come before the senate, such as student advisement, building renovation and pay raises. If I'm elected, I know I could help solve these issues. So on Feb. 8, I urge you to get out and vote for Bryan Miller.

JIM RINNER

As a K-State senior, I have seen four years of changes take place at our University. Many of these changes are initiated, influenced or determined by the student governing body. Student senators, representing each college on campus, comprise this governing body. In order for individual student input to have an effect on issues, it is important to communicate with senators. As an engineering senator, my goal would be to promote stronger channels of communications between the individual and the student government with the use of referendums and opinion polls. These methods allow greater student input, promoting better representation.

Board of Student Publications

LARRY BOYD

As secretary of the Board of Student Publications for the past year, I feel I have gained the experience necessary to fulfill this position. I am familiar with the duties of the board members and have learned a great deal this past year.

I also have acquired useful knowledge by working as a reporter for the Collegian, as well as my hometown newspaper, The Norton Daily Telegram. Majoring in journalism and mass communications, I realize the importance of this position, which involves selecting the editors for the Royal Purple and the Collegian.

I have enjoyed serving K-State in this capacity the past year and will do my best if elected for another term. I urge everybody to vote responsibly in Wednesday's election.

STEVE ONKEN

Being a journalism major, the greatest part of my interests lie in the field of journalism, and specifically, student publications. I have worked on the Royal Purple Yearbook for the past two years, and am currently serving as editor for the 1984 edition, which is the 75th Anniversary issue. I am currently president of the Society for Collegiate Journalists, which allows me the opportunity to communicate with all areas of the campus media.

The future of the quality publications mainly rests in the hands of the newly selected editors of each publication. One of the major responsibilities of the board is in selecting these leaders. If elected, I feel I am sufficiently qualified to represent students in maintaining the strong tradition of excellence in the Collegian and the Royal Purple.

JAMES SEYMOUR

I am currently on the Board of Student Publications. I welcome the responsibility that comes with the office. I have learned from my experience and also have had a bit of fun while holding this position. Thank you for any consideration you may make in my favor. Also, thank you for taking the time to read this. Please remember to vote.

JOHN SLEEZER

After working with and observing the Board of Student Publications operations, I believe my background in publications will serve to benefit my working as a member of Student Publications. I am a junior in journalism and mass communications, which will provide helpful knowledge in properly functioning on the board. Knowing the needs of K-State students through listening and participating in student activities, I can make board decisions to benefit students. I will listen to all sides of the issues before making decisions. This is my planned mode of operation if elected by students to the Board of Student Publications.

JEFF TAYLOR

Being on the Board of Student Publications takes a certain amount of responsibility and a well-rounded knowledge of the operation itself. How can someone who has not experienced the troubles of a student publication make value judgments about its operation? I feel my three years of experience with both the Collegian and the Royal Purple serving, not only as a staff member, but also as an editor dealing with the problems of a publication, qualify me for a position on the Board of Student Publications. Elect someone who cares about student publications and who is not just using it as a resume filler. Vote for Jeff Taylor on Wednesday.

Graduate School

BRIAN O'NEILL

Just getting graduate students to vote is hard to do — we're so much busier than undergrads, and we often aren't in the Union on Wednesdays, which is election day. But this year, there are seven candidates for only four graduate slots in Student Senate, so there are choices to be made. Bill Sullivan and I are the only current graduate senators who have served full terms. We think this experience is very important going into the fee allocation process. No matter how you feel, though, try to vote on Wednesday. A graduate student's vote makes a huge difference in the outcome of the election.

WILLIAM SULLIVAN

I am running for re-election on a strong record of support for graduate students. As a graduate student senator, I have made personal contacts with members of the Board of Regents and the Kansas Legislature to express your concerns over the condition of our library, new graduate research fellowships, graduate teaching assistant salaries and tuition increases. Currently, I represent graduate students on the Dean's Search Committee in the College of Architecture and Design.

In the coming year, I will continue to support the graduate college and also take a broader look at representing the University as a whole. The challenges we face now include taking a critical look at the quality of our academic programs, the undergraduate advising system and declining enrollment.

BECKY WALSH

I want to serve and represent K-State graduate students. I would be willing to spend time listening to the concerns of other graduate students and communicate these concerns to Student Senate. I feel graduate students need to be more vociferous on campus and need to become more involved in student government. I would appreciate your support in the upcoming election and would do my best to represent the K-State graduate students in an effective way.

Committee continues work throughout election process

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

After the last ballot has been cast in the 1984 student government elections, work will continue for the Student Senate Elections Committee.

The committee will count the votes after polls close Wednesday.

Students will use computer cards to vote for candidates running for student body president, Board of Student Publications and Student Senate. However, not all votes can be counted by computer, said Lynn Pennington, committee member and junior in fashion marketing.

"The votes are counted by computer unless they are bent," she said. "Those we must count by hand."

Counting the votes takes about three hours, Pennington said.

"How long it takes to count the votes depends a lot on how many write-ins there are," she said. "The voting is over by 6:30 p.m., and we have the results in three hours or so."

A simple majority of the votes is required to determine the winners in the senate and Board of Student Publications races. No policy has been established in case of ties for these races, Pennington said.

"There is no established policy, so we would have to determine a way to deal with that situation if it happens," she said. "It has never happened before."

A run-off race is usually held between the two student body president candidates with the most votes in the general election. A candidate must have more than 50 percent of the votes to win. The run-off is held one week after the general election.

All student body presidential candidates are notified of the election results, Pennington said.

"Election committee members call all student body president candidates as soon as the results are known," she said.

Senate and Board of Student Publications candidates are not called.

The College of Engineering has 13 candidates for 9 positions. The Board of Student Publications has six candidates for four positions. The Graduate School has seven candidates for four positions. The College of Veterinary Medicine has one candidate for one position.

Four sentenced for drug trafficking

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Four Kansas men were sentenced Monday for their parts in a drug trafficking operation that sent four 1983 Kansas City Royals to prison.

An Overland Park lawyer, Ben David Roselli, 32, considered by authorities to have been a go-between, was sentenced to three years in prison on one count of conspiracy to distribute cocaine. U.S. District Judge Dale E. Saffels recommended that he serve his sentence in a minimum-security prison with a drug treatment center. Roselli has admitted to drug dependency.

Roselli pleaded guilty to the conspiracy charge Oct. 18 as part of a plea-bargain with federal prosecutors.

Roselli said that on June 20 he arranged for another Overland Park man, Mark Liebl, 33, to obtain cocaine for distribution. A search of Liebl's home June 30 revealed several ounces of cocaine, federal prosecutors said.

Roselli said he had little contact with any of the Royals involved in the case. Willie Aikens, Willie Wilson, Jerry Martin and Vida Blue all pleaded guilty to drug charges and are serving sentences in a federal correctional facility in Texas.

U.S. District Judge Earl O'Connor sentenced the three other men involved in the drug investigation.

Paul Torrez Jr., of Dodge City, was sentenced to three years on a charge to distribute cocaine. John Klenke, of Wright, was sentenced to two years in prison and Harry Droste, of Dodge City, was sentenced to 18 months, both for one count of using a communication facility to distribute cocaine.

Hussein checks out after check up

CLEVELAND — Jordan's King Hussein left the Cleveland Clinic during a mild snowstorm Monday after a weekend of medical tests, and his doctor said the king was in "good general health."

Hussein, 48, accompanied by his American-born wife, Queen Noor, checked into the clinic Friday night for a complete physical, with special tests of his cardiovascular system and digestive tract.

Clinic spokesman Frank Weaver said doctors had pinpointed Hussein's gastrointestinal problem, but declined to elaborate. It was "not a serious problem. No treatment was necessary," he said.

Hussein was hospitalized in Jordan last month with some intestinal bleeding and pain.

Woman bucks faith, earns degree

LEWISTOWN, Mont. — A 63-year-old woman who bucked the tradition of her faith will receive a college degree in special education this spring.

Anne Stahl is a member of the Ayers Hutterite Colony east of Lewistown.

For virtually all Hutterites, formal education halts at the eighth grade. Stahl, however, took correspondence courses to get her high school diploma in 1948 and then began college-level courses.

Mostly, she said, she took courses that would directly benefit the colony, such as tax preparations and meat-cutting. But they also included history, psychology and literature.

Through it all, Stahl carried a full work load at the colony, supervising the preparation of three meals a day, 365 days a year, for the colony's members, as many as 65 people.

Weather

Mostly sunny today, highs 50 to 55. South to southwest winds 10 to 20 mph. Becoming cloudy tonight, lows in the low 20s. Mostly cloudy Wednesday, with a chance of light rain or snow. Highs near 40.

Jobs for education majors increase

During the past five years, job prospects for education majors have improved, Jordan Utsey, dean of the College of Education, said.

"Five years ago we had a surplus in most areas except special education and vocational education," Utsey said. "During the last two years we had shortages in almost all areas of secondary education — math, science, vocational education, guidance remedial education. In the next couple years, we will have a general shortage in all areas."

These shortages are caused by fewer students choosing education as a career and the shortened duration of careers in the field. Many teachers begin working for business or industry after five to eight years of teaching, and many women interrupt their careers to raise families, Utsey said.

"We have been very stable (in enrollment) over the past 10 years," Utsey said.

Utsey said K-State's College of Education is stronger than that of smaller schools because the many faculty members have more time to research and develop their specialties. In smaller schools, one person often has to teach in three or four different areas, Utsey said. K-State offers programs in adult and occupational education, agricultural education and home economics education that are not available in other Kansas schools.

Master's degrees are becoming a standard in the education field, Utsey said. Most students seeking a master's degree already have a job and are upgrading their degree.

Fifty to 55 people are granted doctorate degrees from K-State each year in the field of education.

Rifle club promotes itself with open match

By KATHLEEN COLE
Collegian Reporter

This week the K-State Rifle Club aims to promote awareness of its activities by giving non-club members a chance to compete in an All-University Rifle Match, which began Saturday and ends Friday.

The annual event takes place on the Department of Military Science rifle range and was open to full-time students and faculty members. Registration ended Friday. Thirteen teams are competing in 10 different categories, such as men's, women's, and living group teams, John Klindinst, senior drill instructor of military science and riflery instructor, said.

Richard Newallis, sophomore in pre-professional business administration and a member of the Moore Hall Hot Shots team, said he is competing because he wanted to "see how good I can do in competition." He said he took a basic riflery class from Klindinst, but this is his first attempt at riflery competition.

Each team member is required to shoot three times from the prone firing position (lying on the ground) for a maximum of 300 points. Participants shoot single-shot, .22 caliber rifles at a distance of 50 feet. Slings, prone mats, spotter scopes, shooting gloves and jackets are provided.

The all-University tournament is only one of the activities in which club members participate. Beginning Friday, the club will go back on the road to compete in a full schedule of matches.

"This year's Rifle Club consists of nine active shooters and 23 members overall," Klindinst said.

Two teams of eight top shooters participate in competition.

The club secured second, fourth and fifth place positions in seven of the matches they have competed in so far this year.

Rifle Club members are not limited to the Department of Military Science, Klindinst said. The only requirement is that they take a military science course. Practice times are left up to individuals and may depend on their study demands.

From 1959 to 1964, the club lost only three matches, Klindinst said. In 1964, All-American shooter Margaret Thompson led K-State to the Big Eight tournament title and topped all marksmen in her final competition with the team. Thompson went on to win a silver medal in the riflery event at the 1976 Olympics.

About 50 college teams came to K-State in 1976 to compete in the annual Turkey Shoot, a small bore rifle tournament sponsored by the Rifle Club that was billed as one of the largest intercollegiate tournaments conducted. The traditional shoot that began in 1972 was discontinued in 1977 because of its size and expense, Klindinst said.

The schedule for the club this year includes seven more matches and a trip Feb. 17 to the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs to compete for Olympic qualifications. The Big Eight Conference match will be at K-State March 30.

Jury sought in barroom rape case

By The Associated Press

FALL RIVER, Mass. — Potential jurors answered a two-page list of questions Monday on what they knew about the case of six men accused of raping a woman on a barroom pool table, as jury selection began for two simultaneous trials.

An initial pool of 75 people was summoned in what was expected to be a difficult selection process because of the case's notoriety. A total of 32 jurors must be selected for two trials.

The six defendants are accused of raping a 21-year-old woman at Big Dan's tavern in nearby New Bedford on March 6, 1983. Police say the woman was assaulted for over two hours while other patrons in the bar cheered on her attackers.

The case became national news and a rallying point for women's rights. A candlelight protest march staged a few days after the arrests attracted some 2,500 people.

Because of widespread news coverage in the past 11 months, court officials have anticipated difficulty in finding impartial jurors.

By midday, Young had excused 30 potential jurors.

Board suggests options to new prison

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Corrections Secretary Michael Barbara said Monday he agrees with the conclusion of an advisory committee he appointed that building a new prison will not solve Kansas' problem of an exploding inmate population.

Providing judges with alternatives to putting nonviolent offenders behind bars, expanding community-based corrections programs and changing the state's sentencing system so fewer people are incarcerated were recommended by the Advisory Committee on Prison Overcrowding as ways to alleviate the logjam.

Kansas' inmate population stands at 3,790, or within 10 prisoners of what the Corrections Department regards as absolute capacity. At Gov. John Carlin's recommendation, the Legislature already has acted this session to expand the capacity by 336 beds by this summer, but those steps are regarded as stopgap at best.

The advisory committee, headed by Kathleen Sebelius of the Kansas Trial Lawyers Association and including among its members Dr. Walter Menninger of the Menninger Foundation, Ted Heim of the Washburn University Criminal Justice Department and Attorney General Robert Stephan, concluded that building a new prison in Kansas is economic folly.

"Those states which have pursued prison construction as the principal method of relieving overcrowding found themselves as crowded when the new space came on line as before construction began," Sebelius told a news conference at which the panel's final report was made public.

"No state has been able to build its way out of the problem. No one can point to a prison-building state that is not overcrowded."

"Any short-term relief gained by funding capacity expansion will be quickly lost because such an approach treats a symptom of the problem, not the problem itself. The real short and long-term solution must deal with the causes of overcrowding."

Those causes are sentencing laws which send too many nonviolent offenders to prison and lack of community corrections programs statewide, the committee said.

Barbara agreed with most of his committee's recommendations, including the one which said construction within the next 3-4 years of a new $34 million, 500-bed prison, as proposed by Gov. John Carlin, is a foolish expenditure of badly-needed state financial resources. It will be full the day it opens if other steps are not taken, the panel said.

The corrections secretary said that was a long-range recommendation of the governor and was made mostly "to focus on the problem" of overcrowding. It is a "last resort" proposal, Barbara told reporters, because "If nothing is done, there will be just no where to put them."

He said he hopes it will not be necessary to construct a new prison — that alternatives outlined by the committee, plus short-term expansion of the state's present inmate facilities, can alleviate the overcrowding.

However, Barbara disagreed with one major recommendation of his advisory committee.

It suggested the Legislature establish a maximum population for the prison system, and when that capacity is reached have an "emergency release mechanism" in place under which the least dangerous inmates would be released from prison prematurely to make room for those coming into the system.

"The committee found some promise offered by an Iowa Risk Assessment Plan, which could be analyzed and possibly used in Kansas to accelerate the number of paroles," Sebelius said.

"Unless there is a major shift in sentencing patterns and release procedures to more effectively utilize community alternatives to state institutions, the Kansas system will remain in a state of crisis."

However, Barbara took issue with that proposal, saying he opposed it because he thinks it's a too convenient and will cause the state to avoid tackling the other alternatives. "Under that plan," he said, "we say, 'let's just release them.' It's too temporary and stopgap."

Stephan, who had severely criticized the committee's work earlier because he didn't think it was adequately addressing the problem of separating violent and nonviolent inmates, did not attend the news conference but sent a letter with his response to the final report.

He was far less critical than before, saying he agrees "with much of the committee's final report, and find the report's tone and recommendations much more constructive than the committee's earlier draft."

The attorney general said he was especially pleased the committee "has recommended steps intended to separate violent and nonviolent offenders."

He also praised its recommendation for creating a commission to study Kansas' sentencing structure, which hasn't been done for 15 years, and a risk assessment mechanism.

Sebelius said the committee also wants a study to see why Kansas has an inordinately high ratio of Hispanic and black inmates in comparison to the white population in its prisons, and why so many more women are being sentenced to prison than previously.

She said Hispanics and blacks are incarcerated at nine times the rate they should be when compared to whites, and that the number of women sentenced to serve time in prison has risen 100 percent while the male sentencing rate has risen only 36 percent.

Barbara said the main thing he wants is to avoid a bipartisan political fight over the prison overcrowding situation.

"It should not become a political football, embroiled in partisan politics," he said.

Panel blames federal government for hunger

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Hunger "has returned to America" because of unemployment and government policy, according to a study released Tuesday that differs sharply with the recent conclusions of a White House task force.

The commission of educators, physicians, religious leaders and social workers who conducted the study concluded that malnutrition is a serious problem spreading to new groups of Americans.

"We have found that hunger is widespread and increasing," the authors wrote. "Hunger is the result of clear and conscious actions taken by government leaders."

The 112-page report of the Citizens Commission on Hunger in New England blamed inflation, unemployment and government policy.

The authors added, "We have found concrete evidence of hunger in every state we have looked. We found hunger and it wasn't hard to find."

The President's Task Force on Food Assistance announced in January that it could find no evidence of "rampant hunger" and saw no need for new assistance programs.

The commission said its Harvard-based members and staff conducted five months of field investigation in New England. Chairman Larry Brown of the Harvard School of Public Health said the members also reviewed every public and private study of hunger in the United States conducted since 1980 to support their statements about the national dimensions of the problem.

Titled, "American Hunger Crisis," the report calls on Congress to increase funding for federal programs that affect hunger.

"Hunger is widespread enough from a medical perspective to be an epidemic," said Brown, who released the findings at news conferences in Washington and Boston.

The report did not give any estimate of the actual number of hungry Americans. But it said all the evidence gathered from hospitals, soup kitchens, food pantries, social service agencies and official reports from the Agriculture Department and the Congressional Budget Office show an increase in poverty and hunger over the past five years.

The hardest hit are poor newborns and young children, the elderly and families with an unemployed breadwinner, the report said.

Torneden prepares for trials

By LISA MORRELL
Collegian Reporter

When Fred Torneden qualified as a marathon runner for the Olympic Trials in 1980, he was "a little bit naive," he said.

Torneden, a temporary Manhattan resident, didn't make the Olympic team in 1980, but he didn't give up.

On May 26, at the Olympic Trials in Buffalo, N.Y., Torneden will again run in the marathon competition.

"I went into the 1980 trials optimistic and expecting to do well, but you could say I crashed and burned. It was a real disappointment," Torneden said.

In the 1980 race, he finished 93rd in a field of 150 with a time of 2:26, he said.

Anyone running in the marathon on a certified course in 2:19:04 or less, between April 1983 and April 1984, receives an invitation to run in the 1984 trials, Torneden said.

In April 1983 he came in 44th in the Boston Marathon with a time of 2:17:09. He placed first in the Milwaukee Marathon in October 1983 with a time of 2:14:43. Last month he placed sixth in the Houston Marathon with a time of 2:12:44.

Although his times have decreased steadily over the past year, Torneden said he probably will have to get a time of 2:09 or 2:10 to make the three-member Olympic team.

"I have to be realistic about expecting to improve in such a short period of time," he said.

But setting and reaching goals has always been a part of 26-year-old Torneden's life.

Born in Lawrence, he was raised near Topeka.

He began running while a sophomore at Mission Valley High School "just for competition," he said.

After high school graduation in 1975, Torneden attended Butler County Community College. He was conference champion in the 5,000 meter run in both his freshman and sophomore years.

Torneden continued running after he transferred to Fort Hays State University.

He was named All-American for the National Association of Intercollegiate Athletics in four races his senior year, including the marathon.

"I ran the marathon the day after I ran the indoor three-mile race. When I finished the marathon, I knew it was my best event. I knew that I wanted to concentrate on it and continue to train to run in the Olympics," Torneden said.

After failing to win a place on the Olympic team in 1980, he decided to utilize his college degree in graphic design. He worked for two years as a technical illustrator for the Cessna company in Wichita.

The 1984 Olympics were still in his mind, however.

Torneden had been paying close attention to K-State's head track coach, Steve Miller.

"I had respect for him after I started finding out about all the people who were coming to K-State to run," Torneden said.

Torneden works out with the University's men's track team as part of his training. He runs twice a day for a total of 17 to 20 miles. Once a week, he runs a single 20-mile course.

Besides the backing of Miller, of other runners and of trainers, his family and friends "are more supportive than they've ever been," he said.

Torneden said he thought his family pictured him at first as falling into a "stereotyped lifestyle of work after high school."

"Not even 1 percent of the population is involved in athletics professionally," he said. "It's something you do in high school. A lot of people don't understand how competitive and tough sports is."

Torneden said he is looking forward to the Olympic trial marathon run in May.

Although the 26-mile course begins in Buffalo, only the first four miles of the race is in the United States. The remaining 22 miles are in Canada.

Whether he wins or loses at the Olympic trials, Torneden said he will know he ran his best race, and that he did everything he could do.

"You've got to see yourself run to believe you can do it," he said.

If he doesn't make the Olympic team, Torneden said he still will be optimistic.

"I'm certainly keeping my eye on the 1988 Olympics. A runner's best years are from ages 25 to 32," he said. "I'm not one to worry about the future. I take one day at a time."

North Carolina retains top basketball ranking

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Kentucky Wildcats, no longer the intimidating beasts they were earlier this season, tumbled to sixth place in the weekly Associated Press college basketball poll announced Monday — Kentucky's lowest ranking this season.

The plunge from third place came after Kentucky, 16-3, lost to Alabama 69-62 Saturday for its third loss within three weeks.

Top-ranked North Carolina continued to dominate. The Tar Heels, for the third time in four weeks, collected all 62 first-place votes from the panel of sportswriters and broadcasters, and 1,240 points.

North Carolina easily handled Clemson, Furman and the Citadel to raise its record to 20-0. This is the 14th consecutive season that a Dean Smith-coached team has reached a 20-victory season.

Second-ranked DePaul, 17-0, remained unbeaten by edging St. John's 59-57 in overtime in its only game last week. The Blue Demons amassed 1,174 points in a system based on 20 points for each first-place vote, 19 for second, etc.

Georgetown, Nevada-Las Vegas and Houston each leapfrogged a position to third, fourth and fifth, respectively.

The Hoyas, 19-2, collected 1,090 points, while the Rebels, 20-1, received 999, and the Cougars, 19-3, received 969.

The lone newcomer to this week's Top 20 was Washington at number 17. The improving Huskies displaced of previously 20th-ranked UCLA 89-81 in three overtimes, and the Bruins fell from the poll.

Elsewhere in the Top 10, there was no change among numbers seven, eight and nine, as Texas-El Paso, Illinois and Memphis State each won twice during the week.

But Oklahoma, which thrashed Big Eight rivals Kansas 103-84 and Missouri 76-65, entered the top echelon as number 10.

Purdue, which shares the Big 10 lead with Illinois, soared five notches to the eleventh position. Tulsa was little affected by its 66-64 loss to Wichita State, as the Hurricane slipped a notch to number 12.

Gill to pass NFL draft

By The Associated Press

MONTREAL — Turner Gill, who quarterbacked Nebraska to within one game of a national title, signed Monday with the Montreal Concordes of the Canadian Football League rather than waiting for a problematical offer from the United States' two professional football leagues.

Gill, the subject of a yearlong campaign by Concorde officials, who sent CFL decals and promotional literature to him in Nebraska, signed a four-year contract estimated at close to $2 million.

He was drafted by the Houston Gamblers of the United States Football League, but said he never was really interested because the money wasn't attractive. He could have waited for the National Football League draft in May, and he could have pursued a baseball career.

Gill, whose scrambling style is suited to the CFL and its wide fields, said that with the help of agent Ed Keating, he finally made up his mind Saturday night that he was coming north.

He ruled out the NFL because he had the impression from speaking with scouts that he probably would be selected in the middle rounds of the draft, "and I didn't feel comfortable going that low."

IOC rule disqualifies hockey players

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — The International Olympic Committee ruled Monday that anyone who has ever signed a contract with the National Hockey League is not eligible for the Winter Olympics.

The ruling means that at least four players from two teams will be disqualified from the Olympics.

The IOC settled the battle within its ranks over hockey eligibility by deciding that an NHL contract made a player a professional under Olympic rules, endorsing the position of its Eligibility Commission.

Murray Costello, president of the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association, said after the ruling, "They did not mention the names of any players. But, yes, they seem to be limiting it to the NHL."

The IOC asked each team to investigate its players, and if any of them violates the rule, the player should be disqualified from the Games.

But it applies directly to four of the players who have been tied-up in the hockey eligibility controversy of recent days.

Hockey, the first event of the Games, is scheduled to get underway Tuesday. The IOC ruling has the effect of disqualifying Mark Morrison and Don Dietrich of Canada and Jim Corsi and Rich Bragnalo of Italy.

The IOC said, "The Eligibility Commission, in agreement with the IIHF (governing body of the sport), states as of today (Monday) that players are not eligible when they have or have had a contract with the National Hockey League."

The press release distributed by the IOC said the commission's proposal was approved. It was given to reporters a little more than an hour before the rosters were to be submitted for the Olympic hockey tournament.

Five other players whose amateur status was under question after a protest by Finland might well be able to play in the Olympics under the decision. They are Rich Cunningham and Greg Holst of Austria, Dan Wood of Canada, Thomas Milani of Italy and Bjorn Skaare of Norway.

The IOC said that each team should check its players and, if any ineligible ones are found, they should be withdrawn.

The teams would be given four days to replace any players struck from a roster for failing to meet the standards.

But, Murray Costello said after the IOC announcement that he would submit a roster Monday night containing the names of all 20 players.

Costello told reporters, "We will submit all 20 names on the team we brought here and see what happens. We're kind of uncertain about the way the whole thing was stated."

Morrison played nine games with the New York Rangers two seasons ago and Dietrich was with the Chicago Black Hawks earlier this season. Corsi, a goal tender, spent a season with the Edmonton Oilers and Bragnalo played parts of two seasons with the Washington Capitals. But none of those players had signed a contract.

The IOC ruling came in the early evening here and followed a three-hour meeting among Olympic officials and the countries involved in the series of eligibility disputes that have arisen over the teams here.

Nordic skier gains citizenship

By The Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY — A beary-eyed Audun Endestad was sworn in Monday as a U.S. citizen hours after a 6,000-mile journey from Switzerland, where he will return as the newest official member of the American Nordic ski team at the XIV Winter Olympics.

"I would like to thank everyone involved in getting my citizenship," the former Norwegian said in a statement to a packed federal courtroom moments after being sworn in as an American citizen.

The 10-minute ceremony before U.S. District Judge David Winder ended Endestad's 27-month quest for citizenship and a berth on the U.S. Olympic team. The 31-year-old's non-stop flight from Sarajevo, Yugoslavia, took more than 24 hours. He arrived here Sunday night.

It took a special act of Congress and President Reagan's signature last Thursday to gain a waiver of the final nine months of the three-year waiting period for a citizenship hearing. The process was accelerated so Endestad could compete for the American team in Sarajevo this week.

After signing Endestad's naturalization papers, the judge warmly pumped the new citizen's hand and said, "Mr. Endestad, congratulations. We're pleased to have you as a citizen of this country."

Asked what went through his mind as he took the citizenship oath with upraised right hand, Endestad said, "Believing in what I said and hoping to do all that I said."

Endestad, who is married to U.S. women's Nordic team member Judy Rabinowitz, was scheduled to fly to San Francisco later Monday to obtain a passport. He was then to depart early Tuesday for Sarajevo to rejoin his wife and the American Nordic team.

John Dakin, information director for the Utah-based U.S. Ski Team, said Endestad would arrive in Sarajevo less than three hours before opening ceremonies Wednesday.

His attorney, David Littlefield, said Endestad's oath was administered in Salt Lake City because that's where his citizenship application was filed.

Endestad, a nine-year resident of the United States who lives in Fairbanks, Alaska, has been an unofficial member of the U.S. ski team since 1981. He concentrated on training and racing in the World Cup and American cross-country races while his citizenship bid wove its way through the federal bureaucracy.

Thomas wins Big Eight's weekly title

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Malcolm Thomas of Missouri was chosen Big Eight Conference basketball player of the week for scoring 79 points and pulling down 30 rebounds in three games.

Thomas, a junior college transfer in his first year at Missouri, scored 28 points and had eight rebounds in Missouri's 89-51 victory over Colorado. He then scored 34 points and had 11 rebounds against Oklahoma in a losing cause. The 6-foot-7 forward opened the week by scoring 17 points and hauling in 11 rebounds against defending NCAA champion North Carolina State.

Organizations suspend Nestle boycott

By The College Press Service

"All we know is what we saw in the papers," said an organizer of Notre Dame's boycott of Nestle products. "We've heard it's over before, and we don't know if Nestle has actually changed, so we'll keep going for now."

The unease seems to be the typical reaction of campus activists across the nation when informed of the announced suspension of the six-year-old boycott of Nestle products.

"I must confess there is a distrust of the corporation," said Peter Sabey, a boycott organizer at the University of California-Davis and before that at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst.

But last week Nestle and INFAC (the Infant Formula Action Committee), which led the boycott from its Minneapolis headquarters, jointly announced in Washington that the boycott is over for now.

INFAC leader Douglas Johnson later clarified that the boycott is suspended for six months because Nestle agreed to change the way it sells infant formula in the Third World.

If at the end of six months the company is abiding by the agreement, Johnson will call a permanent end to the affair.

Boycotters argued Nestle hadn't adequately informed mothers in underdeveloped countries about some of the dangers of using the formula. Consequently, mothers often diluted the mixture too much, slowly starving their babies to death. Moreover, parents often mixed the formula with contaminated water, causing infection and disease in the infants.

When Nestle refused to stop selling the formula in the Third World and then wouldn't change the directions on the labels to warn parents of the dangers, INFAC organized a wide range of campus, church and civil rights groups to boycott the company's products.

Among other accomplishments, INFAC managed to get the World Health Organization (WHO) to establish guidelines to govern the selling of infant formula in the Third World.

Nestle fought back immediately. It funded a campaign to discredit boycott sponsors and the WHO guidelines.

The boycott took a new turn "when Nestle started to get very public relations-wise in 1982," Jackie Orr, INFAC's communications director, said.

The company, she said, set up the Nestle Coordination Center for Nutrition, hired former Sen. Edmund Muskie to measure the firm's compliance with WHO guidelines, and "targeted our groups and campuses with a sophisticated, slick public relations campaign."

In October 1982 and early 1983, Nestle announced the boycott was over, and INFAC had to scramble to inform its scattered support groups the boycott was, in reality, continuing.

But Orr said the bogus announcements took their toll.

"I don't think there's any doubt there were some campuses that had begun to waver in their support in recent years," Orr said.

Indeed, when Sabey arrived in Davis a year ago, he said he found "a lot of people had forgotten about it, or had been thrown off by press releases."

Johnson denies INFAC suspended the boycott because it was growing weaker.

"We were building steam. An international infant formula conference this week in Mexico City would have brought that much more pressure on Nestle. They, upon reflection, determined to pledge publicly to make a commitment at this time," he said.

The beginning of the end came when Johnson and a Nestle official met by chance on a train from Philadelphia to Washington, and decided they really weren't that far apart, Channing Riggs, a Nestle spokeswoman in Washington, said.

Nestle, Riggs said, wanted to abide by WHO guidelines, but WHO wouldn't step in to say how to implement the guidelines.

Another United Nations agency, UNICEF, agreed to negotiate specific steps for Nestle to follow the guidelines and end the boycott.

In December, INFAC made four "final" demands on Nestle to be met by early February. "Nestle initiated contact with us, and we began talking, and those talks turned into serious negotiations," Orr said.

Orr said they were the first intense and direct negotiations between the adversaries since fall 1982.

Since 1978, when the boycott began, as many as 200 campuses endorsed efforts to ban Nestle products from their vending machines and food services.

"We've never really known exactly how many groups were participating in the boycott," Riggs said. "Five years ago a student government voted to endorse the boycott, but now all of those people are gone. It's still on the books, but no one knows about it."

Some took it off the books. Harvard, for one, repealed its boycott in 1982, as did the American Federation of Teachers.

But many were still going at it. Just a week before Johnson suspended the boycott, a Peoria minister was trying to revivify anti-Nestle efforts at Illinois State University, and Sabey was speaking at Davis.

Davis students formed a Hunger Task Force and had voted to mount a campaign to kick Nestle products off their campus.

"I was a little bit surprised by Johnson's announcement," Sabey said.

Few of the boycotters seem ready to start asking schools to begin stocking Nestle products again, however.

Avoiding Nestle products, Orr said, "has become an ongoing lifestyle for some people. I'm personally not going to encourage anyone to turn back to Nestle Crunch bars for a while."

"It may be some time before I can drink Taster's Choice (a Nestle product) without thinking twice," Sabey said.

Group opposes Wolf Creek plant

By LILLIAN ZIER
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Natural Resource Council advocates the cessation of construction on the Wolf Creek Nuclear Generating Facility, Mari Peterson, KNRC executive director and editor, said.

Although safety factors connected with the facility continue to be a concern, the economic issue is the most important in Kansas, Peterson said. She spoke at a meeting Monday at the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

The KNRC is basing its recommendation on figures released in November which show that the nuclear power plant is 60 percent completed in terms of cost, although it is 90 percent completed in construction.

Peterson said this will mean financial catastrophe for the utility companies involved, including Kansas Gas & Electric and Kansas City Power & Light.

If construction on Wolf Creek stopped now, the power companies would face a loss of about $2 billion, she said.

"They will probably face some sort of bankruptcy if they finish (construction of the Wolf Creek facility)," Peterson said. "It would actually be cheaper to stop at $2 billion and divide the loss than to continue to $3 billion and end up dividing that loss."

One of the issues facing the Kansas Legislature is who will bear the cost, the rate-payer or the stockholder, she said. If the Wolf Creek facility begins operating, about 441,000 Kansas customers will be affected, according to a report by the Kansas Natural Resource Council. Consumers may face rate increases of 50 to 80 percent.

Stockholders may be in danger of not receiving returns on their investments, Peterson said.

"All of a sudden, even though the commission may say you have an opportunity to earn a return, they simply cannot sell the electricity, and they don't get the money to pay their stockholders," Peterson said. "In the order of payments that are made, the utility will first pay the people who hold the bonds, then the preferred stockholders, and the last ones (to be paid) are the common stockholders. The common stockholders are in serious jeopardy of not being able to get dividends once the plant begins operation, she said.

"The other issue is whether or not it is wise to continue construction on this facility. We've taken a real hard look at it from an economic perspective. It's very easy to get hung up on the fact that $2 billion has been spent to date," Peterson said.

Many large corporations are looking for alternative energy resources, she said.

Boeing Aircraft of Wichita and Vulcan, a Wichita-based chemical company, are both considering withdrawing from KG&E, Peterson said. Boeing is considering using the natural gas it owns. Vulcan, which pays KG&E $1 million per month, is also considering changing power sources, she said.

The city of Chanute is building its own power plant because it considers it cheaper than buying from KG&E, she said.

Marines relocate to offshore ships

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Triumphant Moslem rebels in command of west Beirut declared a cease-fire Tuesday in their six-day war with the Lebanese army and said they were withdrawing from the city's devastated streets.

President Reagan, vacationing in California, announced that U.S. Marines would be moved from their beleaguered positions at Beirut's international airport to warships operating along the Lebanese coast. He said the redeployment of the 1,600 Marines "will begin shortly and proceed in stages."

A Christian militia commander, Fadi Frem, called on his fighters to confront the Moslem-leftist challenge, declaring, "We will see them at the battlefield." But no major new clashes were reported.

The future of Lebanon's Christian president, the U.S.-backed Amin Gemayel, hung in the balance, his army weakened by Moslem defections.

Off Beirut, the five-inch guns of the mighty U.S. battleship New Jersey thundered to life at midday Tuesday, shelling what was believed to be a rebel position after the U.S. Marine base at the airport again came under fire. One Marine was wounded.

In west Beirut, 39 employees and dependents of the U.S. Embassy were airlifted out by helicopter because of "the current unstable situation," a Marine spokesman said.

State Department officials in Washington said the evacuees, considered non-essential for the embassy's operation, were taken to a 6th Fleet ship for later transfer to Cyprus. They said 54 personnel, including Marine embassy guards, remained in Beirut.

Two U.S. warships — the carrier Independence and destroyer Ricketts — cut short a port call in Turkey and were steaming back to rejoin the flotilla off Lebanon.

The new explosion of fighting, which began last Thursday and climaxed Monday with the rebel takeover of Moslem west Beirut, has put the multinational Beirut peacekeeping troops in a difficult position — cut off from the Lebanese government they are here to support.

One French soldier was killed and at least 15 other members of the multinational force were wounded — including two Marines — in the fighting Monday and Tuesday. About 200 Lebanese were reported killed and more than 300 wounded in the six days of fighting, police said.

Reagan on Monday reaffirmed U.S. support for Gemayel and blamed the violence on Syria, which backs anti-Gemayel forces. Western governments represented in the Beirut peacekeeping force — the United States, France, Italy and Britain — were consulting urgently Tuesday on "what our mission should be," U.S. Secretary of State George P. Shultz told reporters traveling with him from Brazil to Grenada.

Public pressure was mounting in Britain and Italy for a withdrawal of those countries' forces from Lebanon, and in Washington House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. called again for a pullout of the Marines.

Premiers Francois Mitterrand of France and Bettino Craxi of Italy suggested that U.N. peacekeepers take over the Beirut duties.

The sound of small arms fire and rocket-propelled grenades could be heard coming from the port area Tuesday. The army and Shiite militiamen also still fought near a crossing point between east and west Beirut. But artillery shelling from both sides broke off in mid-afternoon, amid a heavy rain, a Western military source reported.

Berri and Jumblatt called on their forces to observe a 2:15 p.m. cease-fire, and the Lebanese army command said it would join in the truce. But gunfire continued beyond the deadline, though it was less intense.

Phalangist militiamen had fought alongside army troops as they were routed from west Beirut Monday.

At Beirut airport, Marine spokesman Maj. Dennis Brooks said the Marines came under fire before noon from mortars, and the battleship New Jersey fired its five-inch guns at the source of fire. He did not specify whether the attackers were Druse or Shiites.

The Marines came under fire again at 1:15 p.m., he said, and one was wounded, seriously enough to be taken by helicopter for treatment aboard the amphibious assault ship Guam. Another Marine had been wounded Monday.

City animal shelter violates state law

By BEVERLY J. MILLER
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan's city-owned animal shelter may be in violation of state law, but local officials say they aren't too concerned about the infraction.

See related story, page 10.

"The statutes require that animals held by officials must be given exercise, fresh air and not be exposed to zoo animals," said Beverly Hashagen, who operates Pet Hotline, a 24-hour clearing-house for unwanted pets.

The shelter is located just west of the primate house in Sunset Zoo.

State law defines cruelty to animals as "having physical custody of any animal and failing to provide such food, potable water, protection from the elements, opportunity for exercise and other care as is needed for the health or well-being of such kind of animal."

Riley County Attorney Colt Knutson said citizens need to keep close watch on the shelter because cases of cruelty have been reported in other counties' shelters.

"Except for maybe the exercise part, I don't believe we are in non-compliance of the code," Knutson said.

"It is not an ideal situation," said Tim Vanatta, director of the city Parks and Recreation Department. "But the shelter has not been a high priority item for the city. We are aware of its deficiencies and have taken steps to correct some of them."

"The USDA checks our shelter each year. Its report says the ideal would be to move the facility away from the zoo, but we've never been told we are breaking a law."

Part of the shelter's problems seem to stem from the fact that Riley County doesn't contribute funds to the facility. Manhattan Mayor Wanda Fateley said she has long favored a city/county facility.

"For whatever reason, the county is not interested in supporting a shelter," Fateley said. "But the Riley County Police Department will answer city or county calls on animal abuse and can issue citations, even though the county does not have shelter facilities."

Riley County Commissioner Marjorie Morse said the county could adopt an animal licensing code, but she questioned whether such a law would work.

Acker announces building appropriation plans

By KARRA PORTER
Staff Writer

At a press conference Tuesday, K-State President Duane Acker announced building appropriation recommendations for K-State, including funding for Nichols and Weber Halls, new greenhouses and a chemistry building.

The recommendations were made to the Kansas Legislature by a joint House and Senate building committee. The report, which Acker said he hopes will be endorsed by the Legislature, included the expected recommendation of appropriations for the completion of Nichols Hall.

In addition, the committee recommended appropriation of $197,000 for the next fiscal year to complete planning and begin construction of greenhouses to replace those next to King Hall.

The removal of the current greenhouses will clear the site for the construction of a new chemistry building, Acker said. The balance of the money needed to finish the greenhouse project is expected in fiscal year 1986, he said.

The new chemistry building was recommended for an appropriation of $485,000, which was the amount requested by the Kansas Board of Regents, Acker said.

The committee also made recommendations of $250,000 for final planning of Weber Hall's renovations and additions.

"This would provide for not only renovation, but approximately 16,000 square feet of new structure on Weber," Acker said. "That would provide for expansion of the meat laboratory and improved facilities for several activities in the animal sciences and industry department."

A major increase came in the committee's recommendation of $2.8 million for the regents' general fund to be used for energy conservation

Debate on sweetener continues

By SUZANNE LARKIN
Staff Writer

The reported health hazards of NutraSweet, the G.D. Searle & Co. brand name for the sweetener aspartame, are largely unfounded, according to Carole Setser, assistant professor of foods and nutrition. Setser has been performing research concerning aspartame for approximately five years.

"Aspartame has been very carefully tested. There have been more tests on it than any other sweeteners. It was thoroughly tested before it ever came out on the market," Setser said.

However, this white, odorless crystalline powder with a sweet taste has brought complaints from some consumers and researchers that it causes epileptic seizures, deep depression, severe headaches, disorientation, loss of balance, fatigue, menstrual problems and visual impairment.

Woodrow Monte, chairman of Arizona State University's food sciences department, said these effects have been reported and that the Food and Drug Administration is at fault.

"The FDA has not concluded significant testing of aspartame. The testing it has done is heavily biased and poorly done."

"Aspartame had been denied by the FDA until the Reagan administration came along, it's all rather strange to me. Right now we have enough evidence to get it off the market."

Setser, who also is researching other sweetening methods, said she did not believe that govern-

Astronauts successfully complete 'superb,' unrestrained space walk

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Two American astronauts left the safety of their shuttle Tuesday and flew unrestrained for the first time, adding another milestone to man's conquest of space. Said the first man out to the second: "Go enjoy it; have a ball."

Bruce McCandless, then Robert Stewart, unhooked their lifelines and slowly rose up, up and away from Challenger, carried by a $10 million jet-powered backpack to a distance greater than the length of a football field.

"McCandless and his Manned Maneuvering Unit comprise a spacecraft of their own," said Mission Control.

Although they had no sensation of speed, the astronauts were traveling 4.8 miles a second as they zipped over the spinning Earth below. They'll do it again Thursday.

McCandless, who has spent more than a decade preparing for his historic but brief flight, parodied Neil Armstrong's words upon becoming the first man to step on the moon in 1969.

Said McCandless: "That may have been one small step for Neil, but it's a heck of a big leap for me."

Defacing mars Union exhibit promoting black awareness

The challenge of overcoming racial discrimination by this country's black population was once again faced, this time in the Union, when an exhibit sponsored by the Black Student Union to commemorate Black Awareness Month was defaced sometime Monday.

This challenge, as quoted from the August 1983 Ebony Magazine and taken from the black achievement display stated, "The challenge blacks face in 1983 is the same challenge they faced in 1783 and 1883. The challenge, not to mince words, is racism."

The exhibit, located across from the exit of the Union stateroom, included articles both from magazines and newspapers commemorating blacks and their accomplishments. The display was not enclosed, and derogatory comments were written across many of the articles.

Calling out a series of superlatives — "Beautiful, superb, super" — McCandless moved out 320 feet from the ship by firing bursts of gas from small thrusters.

After 90 flawless minutes, he turned the spotlight over to Stewart, with the good wishes: "Go enjoy it, have a ball."

Stewart hung up momentarily in a wrist tether as he moved out. But he quickly freed himself and maneuvered out, commenting: "It's a piece of cake." He went 303 feet out from the shuttle before turning back.

Stewart, a 41-year-old lieutenant colonel and the first Army man to fly in space, concluded his excursion by using a latch device to practice hooking onto a pin like that on the Solar Max satellite — just as will be done in April. He then returned the MMU to the recharging station.

McCandless, also rehearsing for the Solar Max rescue, planted his feet in restraints on a "cherry picker" platform mounted on the end of the shuttle's 50-foot robot arm, controlled from inside the shuttle by mission specialist Ron McNair. The restraints held McCandless steady while, hanging upside down, he removed and replaced an electronics unit like that on the disabled satellite.

While outside, both did some repairs on a science experiment and a loose thermal blanket. They brought in one camera with a lens partially blocked since launch day.

Bayley's performance is being sponsored by the Union Program Council's Coffeehouse Committee in conjunction with Black Heritage Month activities.

Bayley began playing professionally in South America at the age of 14. A religious scholarship brought him to the United States in 1966, and he has since become an ordained minister at Oral Roberts University.

Since 1972 Bayley has lived in Kansas City, and his work has evolved from evangelistic folk music to a repertoire that includes pop, jazz and rock influences. He has been a warm up act for such artists as The Ohio Players, Bill Withers, Lou Reed and the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band.

Bayley plays both twelve and six-string guitars, mandolin, bazouki and Latin and African percussion instruments.

Tickets are available in the Union Activities Center and also will be available at the door. Doors will open at 7 p.m.

University to convert roads into pedestrian walkways

University Facility's long-range planning committee has decided to change Old Claflin Road into a walkway, and the road will be closed this spring so the plans can be carried out.

The change will alleviate the problem of cars hindering the progress of pedestrians through campus.

This is the first step in a series of similar conversions. Mid-Campus Drive south of Anderson Hall will be the next campus road to be changed to a walkway.

"We're trying to make it easier for pedestrians to get around campus by changing campus roads into walkways which would accommodate only service and emergency vehicles," Gene Cross, vice president for University Facilities, said.

"We're trying to eliminate campus roads," he said. "This way, the major roads on the periphery of campus will handle the main flow of traffic. Right now there is a problem of cars getting in the way of pedestrians going through campus."

The long-range planning committee will meet the first Friday of each month at 1 p.m. in the Dykstra Hall conference room. The meetings are open to the public.

The outline on page 1 of Tuesday's Collegian incorrectly named Putnam Hall as the sponsor of a debate between student body presidential candidates. The debate was actually sponsored by the Association of Residence Halls.

Soapbox corrections

Pictures of Hisham "Sam" Hawari, junior in electrical engineering, and Shelly Henderson, junior in political science, were accidentally not included in Tuesday's Soapbox of Student Senate candidates.

Hawari is a Senate candidate from the College of Engineering. His soapbox statement appeared on page 9 of Tuesday's Collegian. Henderson is a Senate candidate from the College of Arts and Sciences. Her soapbox statement appeared on page 7 of Tuesday's Collegian. Henderson's first name above her statement was misspelled on Tuesday.

U-LearnN Line

I get extremely nervous before tests, and I know I don't do as well on them as I can. Is there anything I can do?

Test anxiety can be controlled, but it takes skills that must be learned. First, you must understand what happens to your body when the anxiety hits. Second, you must learn to control these stress-related symptoms using stress management techniques. After you have learned to reduce or control the symptoms, you can use the stress management techniques to calm anxiety during tests. U-LearnN and the Counseling Center, Holton Hall, offer free help with test anxiety management.

I need a tutor. Where can I get one?

There are several places on campus that offer tutoring services. U-LearnN has a list of tutors covering a variety of subjects and provides you with the name and telephone number. Students make their own contracts.

It also is suggested that you contact the department through which the tutored class is being taught. Many campus departments keep a list of tutors they make available to students. Special Services also provides tutors for students who qualify for their help. A student must fill out a needs assessment form to determine whether he qualifies.

I have a lot of trouble communicating. Is there anyone on campus who could help me be more assertive?

The Women's Resource Center has a variety of resources on assertiveness which are available to anyone on campus. In addition, U-LearnN and the Counseling Center will be offering assertiveness training workshops during the month of February and beginning of March. Anyone interested should call U-LearnN at 532-6442.

Reagan budget masks student aid cuts

By The College Press Service

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Using a little sleight of hand, the Reagan administration last week unveiled what it hailed as the largest federal education budget in U.S. history, but which in fact amounts to a small cut in student financial aid.

With the new proposal, the administration asks Congress to appropriate some $6.5 billion for student aid, but change the rules for distributing it.

College lobbyists estimate the rules changes could translate into a loss of more than one million grants and loans during 1984-85 academic year.

President Reagan's new aid budget means "students will have to borrow a lot more and work a lot more," said Peter Rogoff, head of the National Coalition of Independent College and University Students.

Changes in the ways students can get Pell Grants would eliminate 300,000 of the grants, meaning more students would have to go into debt with student loans, Kathy Ozer, lobbyist for the United States Student Association (USSA), said.

And if Congress approves, there would be 913,000 fewer grants and fellowships awarded in 1984-85 under other programs, said Charles Saunders, legislative director of the American Council on Education.

When all the numbers are added up, this year's Reagan college budget looks very much like last year's, Saunders said.

The president proposed "pretty much the same budget in fiscal 1985," Mary Hatwood Futrell, president of the National Education Association, said.

Last year, Congress added about $450 million to the administration's proposed college budget. Now the president wants to cut "just about what Congress added last year," Saunders said.

But to Education Secretary Terrel Bell, who announced the budget in two briefings on Feb. 1 in a small Department of Education auditorium, the new budget's key is attitude.

"The administration is again proposing a major philosophical shift in federal student aid," he told assembled reporters, "a return to a traditional emphasis on parents' and students' responsibility for financing college costs."

In asking parents and students to pay a greater share of their college costs, Bell wants them to make down payments of up to $500 to their colleges in order to qualify for Pell Grants.

He also wants to make all students take a "needs test" to determine how much they can borrow under the Guaranteed Student Loan (GSL) program, and to increase their interest payments under the National Direct Student Loan (NDSL) program.

The new budget also would allow students to receive up to $3,000 in Pell Grants, up from the current maximum of $1,900.

But Ozer said the larger Pell Grant awards will push some students out of the program altogether.

In his budget presentation, Bell argued that the administration is enlarging the Pell Grant pie as well as the size of the slices. He claimed the president is asking for $2.8 billion in Pell Grant funding, up from $2.773 billion last year.

But Ozer said that while the Reagan administration last year asked Congress to appropriate $2.773 billion for Pell Grants, Congress actually appropriated $2.8 billion.

Bell's proposal, therefore, actually is for level funding, and represents an increase only from the administration's request of a year ago.

Ozer also said the administration is trying to stretch its math by claiming to propose a $295 million increase in College Work-Study funding.

The Reagan administration figures include the 20 percent — or at least $60 million — of the funds that colleges put up as their part of the Work-Study program. The actual federal increase would be 42 percent, not the 53 percent Bell claimed at his presentations.

Bell presented the budget twice, once to the education community and once to the press, so the press was unable to get any immediate reaction to the budget proposals and wrote initial stories emphasizing the record-high overall education request.

Education experts, Ozer said, were "not able to ask pointed questions of Bell with the press looking in."

Education Department spokesman Michael Becker denies any attempt to manage the news, saying there simply was no room large enough to seat both groups at once.

The experts almost uniformly hailed the proposed GSL increases, but were unhappy about the budget's other features.

Bell would eliminate funding for NDSLs, Supplemental Education Opportunity Grants (SEOG) and State Student Incentive Grants (SSIG) because they duplicate other programs and don't work well.

"Federal funds appear unnecessary as a stimulant to state efforts," Bell said, noting state spending for grants has continued to expand in recent years as federal funding has declined.

But the administration's argument that states will compensate for eliminated NDSLs, SEOGs and SSIGs "is just hokum," Saunders said.

Most lobbyists saved their criticism for the proposed restructuring of student aid to make students make some sort of down payment.

"(We are) strongly opposed to it because of the impact on families with incomes between $6,000 and $14,000," William Blakey, lawyer for the House Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education, said.

Display defacement is a disgrace

It is indeed sad to imagine that K-State might harbor individuals rife with racism, bigotry and prejudice. But evidently it is true.

A display outside the Union stateroom by the Black Student Union honoring black men was horribly defaced and desecrated Tuesday by an unknown person or people. Scrawled in black marker were the derogatory words "nigger" and many other equally disparaging phrases. In addition, "KKK," designating the Ku Klux Klan, was also written on the display.

One fact must be admitted: the display, in observance of Black History Month, was crudely taped to the outside of the glass display case on the first floor of the Union. Most exhibits there are displayed inside the case, protected from possible vandalism. Perhaps this display of magazine articles and newspaper clippings should have been taped to the inside of the glass case. Readability would not have been hindered and the display would have been protected from vandals.

But regardless of the vulnerability of the display, such prejudicial actions are inexcusable and intolerable. No group or display should be subject to such defamation. To think that this University is host to people who would engage in such bigoted behavior is a shame and embarrassment to all students, faculty, staff, administration, alumni and guests of the University.

Universities traditionally have pioneered society's academic learning, and likewise should set an example of awareness and understanding between all people. A university should represent equality — not allow racism. That some people at K-State evidently cannot do so is a disgrace.

Strays present problem for city

A serious problem is present in Manhattan: few facilities exist to care for stray cats.

The K-State Veterinary Medicine Complex will shelter an injured cat, but will only accept a healthy cat upon payment of a $10 fee. If the cat is not adopted within eight days, it is destroyed.

The animal shelter at the Sunset Zoo does not accept cats because there are no city ordinances for dealing with cats.

The only other facility available to care for stray cats is the H&W Kennel and Shelter on Fort Riley Boulevard. This shelter takes in both cats and dogs, operating from donations and profits from animal boarding. Since last May, the shelter has taken in at least 600 stray cats and put them up for adoption.

H&W Kennel offered to go before the city commission last year to contract for part of its kennel space to be used as the city animal shelter. This would have moved the shelter from Sunset Zoo to the kennel without costing the city any more money than the little it already spends on the shelter at the zoo. But the city was not concerned with addressing this proposal, which would have presented a possible solution to the problem.

City and county officials continue to ignore the stray cat problem. Indeed, the Riley County Humane Society has never been equipped with a facility from which to operate. The humane society instead refers inquiries to the veterinary complex and H&W Kennel for shelter of strays.

Due to the continual turnover of area college students and military personnel, pets are often abandoned. The problem is not going to go away.

The city and Riley County need to recognize the stray cat problem. It must be an issue about which something is done. The city and county should work together and share responsibility to enact ordinances and provide adequate funding for dealing properly with stray cats in Manhattan.

Student elections require voting

Do you really care if our library is accredited? Does declining enrollment cause you to lose sleep at night? Are you not graduating on time because of poor advising? Are you afraid to walk across campus at night?

If your answers to the above questions are no, then you probably are not voting in today's Student Governing Association elections. And you will not be alone.

Approximately 15,500 of K-State's 18,500 students will not vote. Therefore, a minority of students will elect the next student body president and Student Senate, who will represent a majority of the students on this campus.

This probably will happen because many students do not realize the impact the person holding the office can make on the individual student. Many students feel all the issues the current candidates are addressing are not necessarily important to them, or the students may feel the elected representatives cannot have a direct impact on the issues.

The issues may seem redundant. Obviously the candidates are not distinguishable by their stand on the issues because they all have similar proposals to correct them.

Issues are important, but there is more to consider besides issues and experience when selecting candidates. So how do you decide what students to elect?

The candidate you feel most comfortable listening to and who conveys sincerity should provide the answer. The student may not have all the answers to the University's problems, but he or she needs to be sincere and willing to take time to work with students on issues of concern.

The student body president often meets with high school students and alumni. This may be the only contact these individuals will have with a K-State student. Therefore, first impressions are very important.

Don't vote for a candidate just because he or she can recite every legislator's name, hometown, district number and favorite color.

Vote for an individual who has past experience working with students, faculty and administration on a one-to-one basis.

Don't vote for a candidate who promises to make massive changes in the University bureaucracy.

Vote for a candidate who encourages student participation from many campus groups so that all can be equally represented.

Don't vote just because a candidate promises to represent your group.

Vote for the candidate who most reflects your interests.

Don't forget to vote.

(Editor's note: Jerry Katlin is the current student body president and is a graduate in public administration.)

Finding the writer of 'Alma Mater'

Who wrote K-State's "Alma Mater"? A simple question, I thought. Surely anyone could pick up a book, flip through its index and find where to look for this simple bit of information.

Wrong.

I spent some time looking through various books and journals, including the general class catalog, before I made a decision: call the Department of Music. Since the band plays the song, surely someone over there must know who wrote it, I thought.

I called the department and, after a short delay, was courteously told that H.W. Jones, class of 1888, wrote the song. I also was told Jones' portrait could be seen near the music department's office in McCain Auditorium.

I went over to McCain. Sure enough, there was a portrait of Jones in a display case. Underneath the portrait was a plaque honoring Humphrey Jones as author of the "Alma Mater."

I decided to find out this tidbit of information due to a couple of incidents at the men's basketball games last week. I noticed few people were singing the "Alma Mater."

Oh, there were the few who made up their own words to the song as it was played. Some people looked around, trying to read lips. Others stood silently as the song was played.

Yes, I know there are more pressing issues to be dealt with in this world. Student elections are taking place today. The Marines are still acting like moles in Lebanon. There are two satellites in the wrong orbits above us. Why worry about some old song few people care about?

I guess my age is showing. I will graduate in May (I hope). The lure of discovering why certain traditions exist has become a new area to explore before I become an alumnus.

I've tried to imagine what it would be like to write something which people will sing for many years. The thought of having one's words and music live through generations of new students is almost like immortality; part of Humphrey Jones lives each time the alma mater is played and sung.

While taking in a well-rounded sampling of basketball through the years, I've noticed other schools manage to sing their school songs with reasonable care and skill. Why can't K-State do the same?

Two years ago, back when fans camped out for tickets and the best game seats, copies of the "Alma Mater" lyrics were distributed by members of Mariatt 4, the organizer of the camp out for those seeking non-reserved tickets. I had a copy, but lost it after I learned the words.

I borrowed a copy of the "Alma Mater" from Paul Cater. His copy was frayed and worn, but the words were still clear:

"I know a spot that I love full well; 'Tis not in forest, nor yet in dell; 'Ever it holds me in magic spell. 'I think of thee, Alma Mater. 'K! S! U! We'll carry the banner high. 'K! S! U! Long, long may thy colors fly. 'Loyal to thee, thy children will swell the cry, 'Hail! Hail! Hail! Alma Mater."

Every time I hear the song, I think about the things I've done at K-State: the good as well as the bad, the wild times and the special times.

And that, my good friends, is what the "Alma Mater" is all about.

Argument for prayer shows irresponsibility

Editor,

Re: Lauri Diehl's column, "A prayer for prayer in schools," in the Feb. 6 Collegian:

This morning when I picked up the paper and turned to the usually well-done editorial page, I was very surprised — and deeply saddened as a journalist — that such a current and complicated issue as voluntary school prayer was handled with such irresponsibility and near reckless abandon. Though Diehl certainly has a right to feel the way she does, as a journalist she also has a genuine responsibility to give the public truth rather than speculation. In this case, it seems that truth was sacrificed to make room for "cute."

To my dismay, her ill-chosen words seemed to indicate that she hadn't even bothered to read the bill before writing about it. For example, the words "mandatory prayer in schools," were used to describe a bill that explicitly deals with "voluntary prayer." The bill even defines its use of the word "voluntary." As used herein, "voluntary" means an activity in which a student is not required to participate by school authorities. How anyone could read the bill and come away describing it with the word "mandatory" is beyond comprehension.

Laying all of the other inflammatory problems aside, there was one major error with the article that went right by the editors. Unhappily, again, it involves journalistic integrity. That is, the argument that the whole article rests on is actually a "straw man" argument. ("A straw man is the misrepresentation of an opponent's argument to make it seem weaker than it is." — "The Oxford Guide to Writing.") By using such phrases as "convert the worst sinner in a second-grade class" and "guide these innocent minds" (not to mention names such as "godless communists and heretics"), she assigned beliefs to a group that simply does not claim them.

I sincerely hope that in future articles, such remedial mistakes will be caught and corrected before they have a chance to do even more damage.

Sarcasm extends beyond prayer column...

Editor,

Re: Lauri Diehl's column, "A prayer for prayer in schools," in the Feb. 6 Collegian:

I am a great lover of sarcasm, and I would like to expound on Diehl's column.

Don't you think it odd that many ultra-religious people are also ultra-pushy?

Don't you find it curious that people base an argument merely on the assumption that they are right?

Isn't it queer that many advocate freedom of religion as long as it is their particular one?

Isn't it funny how many are willing to create a godly fascist regime?

Is it possible to guarantee salvation of nasty children whose parents have led them astray?

Can it be fair to demand that people worship a style of life that has been behind nearly every bloody conflict in history?

Don't you find it curious that many righteous men and women are using government legislation to force their views on others?

Have you ever had an atheist get you out of bed on a Sunday morning to convince you that you cannot be saved?

Isn't it ironic that a person who advocates humility and submission is filthy rich?

Does it make sense to hold a Bible in one hand and a semi-automatic in the other, killing for the glory of God?

I didn't grow up with a Bible. I just wanted to be Batman or a cowboy. I didn't want to be a dictator. I do not deny others their beliefs, and I will not have mine or my children's denied.

Mary McGinty

...but format used unjustly

Editor,

Re: Lauri Diehl's column, "A prayer for prayer in schools," in the Feb. 6 Collegian:

It is not Diehl's opinion of prayer in schools I disagree with. It is the format she used to express her opinion that upset me. Her article expresses her opinion sarcastically in the form of a prayer. She even goes as far as starting the article with "let us pray," and ends it with "Amen." If Diehl is against public prayer in schools, why did she print her column as a prayer in the school's paper?

In the column, Diehl expresses many reasons why she is against school prayer that make a lot of sense. I feel it would have been a much better column if she would have come right out and wrote what she felt instead of writing it the way she did.

In the second-to-last paragraph she quotes from the Bible: "And when you pray, you are not to be as the hypocrites; for they love to stand and pray in the synagogues and on the street corner, in order to be seen by men." Matthew 6:5-6. Right before this quote she suggested that the Bible must have misquoted Jesus. I suggest Jesus was not misquoted, just part of what he said might have been left out — the part about not using prayer sarcastically to express one's opinion in a newspaper column.

Biology class causes frustration, resentment

Editor,

Re: Sheila Eppard's column, "Biology course needs improvement," in the Jan. 31 Collegian:

I have to agree 100 percent with Eppard. I found the course to be very frustrating and a waste of my time and money. This was not due to being a freshman faced with adult responsibility, as some have eluded. I took the course as a junior, quite accustomed to handling responsibility.

When I took the class, I found the A.T. lab quite degrading. I would sit down in a booth ready to learn, and the awful voice of Dr. Zimmerman would begin speaking to me on a kindergarten level. "Why does water boil? Because the water molecules get so excited they jump right out of the pan." This is a great explanation for a 3-year-old, not a college science class that I'm paying for.

My real resentment was toward the weekly quizzes. The course was not taught consistently. The lab was geared toward a kindergarten level and the quizzes were geared above a freshman level. No wonder students become frustrated!

I also agree with Eppard in that a lecture would be nice. If the course was taught sufficiently, there wouldn't be a need for 14 help sessions. The class greatly frustrated and infuriated me, making it very difficult to learn — the reason I paid for the class. This is a shame since biology is a fascinating subject.

K-State President Duane Acker stands aside as Bruce McCallum, director of Public Works for Manhattan, answers a question concerning a new fire station and training center during a press conference. The facility will be built at the corner of Denison and Kimball avenues.

and special maintenance projects, Acker said. "In recent years, the regents system has received about $1 million, and this recommendation is for $2.8 million, so that should let us speed up the installation of energy-saving improvements as well as maintenance needs in several buildings on the campus," he said. "The second key issue here is that the building committee is recommending that this come from the general fund, in contrast to past years, when it came from the higher education building fund.

What that means is that the building fund, then, can be used exclusively for the earlier projects I mentioned."

Several city representatives also were on hand at the briefing to discuss the city's plans to build a new fire station on University property. The University is leasing 6.4 acres to the city for the station, which will be located at the intersection of Denison and Kimball avenues.

Acker reiterated his opinion that the new station will enable the Manhattan Fire Department to provide better campus fire protection, a responsibility assumed by the department last July.

"The location of this facility on University land with good access to the central campus will, I think, enhance the coverage for the University proper," he said. "I think it's mutually advantageous that this become established."

Acker commended the architects for their efforts to "blend (the station) aesthetically" with the University, specifically mentioning the site plantings and limestone surface of the building.

Architect Brent Bowman, of Brent Bowman and Associates, presented color diagrams of the projected appearance of the station, which is estimated to cost about $2.2 million.

The city's timetable includes awarding construction contracts this month. It plans to receive bids for mechanical and engineering construction Feb. 14 and general construction Feb. 16. Construction is scheduled to begin April 1, with all construction to be completed by that date next year.

Hanging 'victim' only a pinata

WICHITA — Vickie Navarro couldn't figure out what was happening when police kicked down her back door and came charging upstairs past her.

"They scared the daylight out of me," said Navarro, 25. "There were gobs of them and paramedics, too."

But police sent a city worker Monday to repair the door. Officers explained that they broke into the house Friday night because someone had reported seeing a child hanging from the ceiling in an upstairs room.

The "victim" turned out to be a four-foot tall paper-mache Mexican pinata that had been hanging in Navarro's oldest daughter's bedroom since August.

Committee approves drinking bill

WASHINGTON — The House Energy and Commerce Committee on Tuesday approved a bill that would prohibit most bars and liquor stores from selling alcoholic beverages to anyone under 21.

The bill uses the federal power to regulate interstate commerce to forbid an establishment which sells anything made in another state from selling alcohol to those under age.

Presently 31 states have drinking ages lower than 21.

The bill would not keep those under age from drinking, as long as they weren't in an establishment in interstate commerce.

Minister sentenced for tax fraud

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A Universal Life Church minister was sentenced to five years in prison Tuesday for giving false receipts of contributions to six people so they could file fraudulent income tax returns.

George W. Leigh, 63, had entered a no-contest plea Sept. 26 to a seven-count indictment.

Before sentencing, Leigh read a prepared statement in which he said his actions were based on his religious beliefs and that he was devoted to his religious beliefs.

Police suspect prize-fighting abuse

WICHITA — Police continued their investigation Tuesday into an 8-year-old girl's claim that she was forced to participate in an organized prize fight with another youngster her age.

Detective Capt. Mike Hill said detectives were continuing interviews with the girl and others in an attempt to confirm the story. He had expected to announce preliminary findings Tuesday afternoon, but Detective Lt. Gary Stokes said late Tuesday afternoon there was nothing new to report.

Karen Stewart, a nurse at Lawrence Elementary School in Wichita, reported to police the girl came to her Monday with numerous bruises on her arms and chest. The girl said she had been taken someplace by her uncle during the weekend and had been forced into a $100 fistfight with another girl about her age, Stewart told police.

According to police reports, the girl told the nurse she lost the fight and her mother used a belt and a large wooden spoon to hit her when she came home without the $100 prize.

Sweetener

ment was a factor.

"Yes, we need to use caution — to overuse anything is going to be harmful — but aspartame is not something that we should be alarmed about," she said. "And I don't believe Reagan coming into office had anything to do with aspartame coming out on the market. Public inquiries concerning aspartame have been going on for many administrations."

This sweetener with the natural taste of sugar is not a carbohydrate. It is made of two amino acids like those found naturally in foods. Because it is approximately 200 times sweeter than sucrose, a sugar found in such substances as sugar cane and sugar beets, foods made with NutraSweet are reduced in calories as well as carbohydrates.

Since its discovery in 1965, aspartame has been through various studies, including the following:

March 1966 — Searle began two years of extensive research to learn properties and commercial uses of aspartame.

June 1969 — Searle began safety testing for FDA review of aspartame.

February 1973 — Searle submitted a petition to FDA for use of aspartame as a food additive.

July 1974 — The FDA approved aspartame for use in dry-based foods and beverages.

August 1974 — Objections were filed to FDA's approval of aspartame.

December 1974 — The FDA proposed a Public Board of Inquiry be formed for resolving questions raised by objectors.

December 1975 — The FDA Commissioner stayed approval of aspartame pending validation of certain Searle research studies and the Board of Inquiry was held in temporary suspension.

September 1976 — The FDA recommended that Universities Associated for Research and Education in Pathology (UAREP) review 15 aspartame toxicity studies. Searle agreed.

April 1977 — The FDA decided it would review three of the 15 studies to speed up validation processes.

July 1977 — The FDA completed validation of the three Searle studies. UAREP validated the remaining 12 Searle studies.

April 1979 — Searle asked the FDA to lift its stay on aspartame's approval. The FDA Commissioner determined that Board of Inquiry investigations on original objections should be conducted first.

August 1979 — France approved use of aspartame as a sweetener in tablet form.

1981 — FDA judged aspartame to be safe for use in everyday foods.

According to the G.D. Searle & Co., more than 100 scientific studies were conducted on NutraSweet prior to its approval.

"Our work is done to help people find and be sure that the ways they use aspartame are safe. We also are looking for new ways to use aspartame and other sweeteners," Setser said.

Diabetics and those who have the disease phenylketonuria (a genetic disorder which has caused mental retardation in infants) need to be concerned with the levels of aspartame they ingest because it contains phenylalanine, an amino acid. Some people have allergies and reactions to many substances. However, the average person who uses aspartame in moderation does not need to be alarmed," she said.

"Aspartame is great for the special-needs groups. It is helpful for the people watching their weight, but it is necessary for people like diabetics who must have an alternative sweetener," Setser said.

Another concern expressed by Monte is that aspartame in soft drinks would break down into methanol — a colorless, flammable liquid — when stored at 86 degrees.

As quoted from a recent Associated Press article concerning aspartame, "methanol has caused cancer in lab animals when inhaled in large quantities, and it can further decompose into formaldehyde, a proven carcinogen (cancer-producing substance) when inhaled."

The FDA, however, asserted that the doses of chemicals that consumers would ingest in soft drinks with aspartame would be harmless.

A combination approach to diet sweeteners has taken hold of the diet soda market today, Setser said.

"Most manufacturers are using the multiple sweetener approach of sweetening their product. They might be using the combination of saccharin and aspartame or one of those with fructose or lower levels of other carbohydrate sweeteners," Setser said.

Aspartame is not just used in diet soda.

G.D. Searle & Co. uses aspartame in numerous pre-sweetened dry foods and beverages and liquid and semimolid systems such as chewing gum, whipped topping, jams and jellies, breakfast cereals, hot chocolate, frozen desserts, confections, salad dressings, fruit juices and yogurt. It is used in roughly 40 products in 22 countries.

The FDA has approved the use of NutraSweet for the following food and beverage categories: powdered soft drinks; cold breakfast cereals; dry mixes for gelatins, puddings and fillings, dairy product toppings, instant coffees and teas; tabletop sweetener as packets and tablets; and chewing gum.

"The high cost of aspartame won't have an effect on its success. It is definitely more costly than saccharin, but there is a market out there for it — the calorie watchers and special-needs people who really desire it. It has less aftertaste than saccharin," Setser said.

Searle is planning to increase aspartame's production capacity. It will open a $100 million aspartame plant in Georgia in 1985, and it may sign up more outside suppliers such as Genex Corp., which would produce aspartame through a gene-splicing process which could cut the product's price, according to a recent article in Newsweek magazine.

"We are assuring consumers that we have seen safety data which convinced us aspartame was safe, even at extraordinary abuse levels of six times what the highest use (soft drink consumption) is likely to be," Bill Grigg, a spokesman for the FDA, said.

Searle's patent is valid until 1992.

Deface

Anne Butler, director of Educational Supportive Services and adviser to the Black Student Union, said Black Awareness Week is a time for blacks to reflect on their accomplishments and their culture.

"In the late 1920s, Carter G. Woodson, quoted as being the father of black history, began Black Awareness Month during February," she said.

The racial slang and derogatory comments which were written across many of the articles in the display were not in good taste, said Veryl Switzer, assistant vice president for student affairs and head of minority affairs programs.

"The defacement is a negative reflection of our University environment and community at large," he said. "It just shows that we are still living in an environment with people who have sick minds."

"More exposure to blacks and their accomplishments will lessen the occurrence of such acts in the future. We need to better educate our community. The displays will continue throughout the week," he said.

Rawn Williams, senior in radio and television, said he agrees with Switzer.

"The displays shouldn't be taken down. That would defeat the purpose," Williams said. "Leaving up the display will just show the positive side of black culture and the negative side of the white or whatever culture defaced our display."

Switzer said more education in black history is necessary, and these displays are important.

"We need to educate our community, but we have a long way to go in racial understanding," he said.

John Coburn, senior in marketing, also emphasized further education.

"Things like this shouldn't happen on a university campus," Coburn said. "If you have something to say, defacing something with a meaning is not the way to do it. The display is not just for blacks — it is there to educate everyone."

Application errors slow student aid process

By DENISE WILLSON
Collegian Reporter

Inaccuracy is a major problem when applying for financial aid, and students are responsible for most of the errors that delay aid processing, said Robert Evans, director of Student Financial Assistance.

"They (students) leave the form incomplete or report conflicting data," Evans said, and "that's where the problem starts."

Without a valid student aid report, the process for aid application stops, he said. After any problems and discrepancies are resolved, the process continues. Evans referred to this correction time as a "looping process."

A federal provision requires auditing and verification of aid application forms. Four years ago K-State installed a computer system that checks data for accuracy.

"K-State's financial aid department can process applications faster than any other Kansas university," Evans said.

Another reason the department can process the applications faster is because of the help provided by peer counselors who work in the department — students who are trained to work with financial aid, he said.

"They (the peer counselors) are the backbone of the operation," Evans said. "They can turn around the procedure faster than anyone else. K-State is the only university that processes loan applications while you wait. You know your eligibility when you leave the office."

Evans said the normal amount of time required to process an application is three to four weeks, compared to six to eight weeks in previous years.

However, two students found the time to process an application took longer than expected.

Tim Dorsey, sophomore in natural resource management, said he still had not received a Pell Grant he applied for last March.

According to Dorsey, he filled out the proper forms and returned them to the Office of Student Financial Assistance in Fairchild Hall. Later he received in the mail a checklist of various items that the department needed. After returning the required information, Dorsey still received three more checklists, each with a different item checked.

Dorsey said he eventually had to get a Guaranteed Student Loan (GSL) because the Pell Grant did not arrive in time for the fall 1983 semester.

The process for applying for financial aid and scholarships begins by filling out the Kansas Student Data Form. If applying for other aid, a student must fill out a Family Financial Statement.

Evans said there are specific dates to remember when completing and returning an aid application. Students who turned in their applications before Jan. 15 are receiving first priority for processing. The department continues to accept applications for scholarships and other aid until March 15.

To apply for a GSL, a student must fill out a form and send it to a lender, usually a bank, which then transfers it to a guarantee agency, the Higher Education Assistance Foundation. After a promissory note is signed for the lender, it should take less than a week to receive the aid, Evans said.

"Both processes can take the same amount of time," he said. "They are just done at different times."

Loans consume half of student aid pie

By DENISE WILLSON
Collegian Reporter

Thirty million dollars of financial aid is awarded yearly at K-State, and this amount is divided into several loan and scholarship programs.

The largest portion of financial aid goes to the Guaranteed Student Loan program. The GSL program uses $15 million each year, Robert Evans, director of student financial assistance, said.

According to information from the Office of Student Financial Assistance, the GSLs loans with low interest rates, ranging from 7 to 9 percent. It is the only loan offered at K-State that goes through a lender and is not federally funded.

An undergraduate student is allowed to borrow up to $2,500 per year under the GSL program, while a graduate student can borrow up to $5,000 a year.

The borrowed sum, however, cannot exceed the cost of education for the time period the loan is to be used. If a student's parents earn over $30,000 a year, the amount of the loan may be limited, depending on the student's need.

Need is determined by comparing the cost of education — tuition, room, board and supplies — with the amount the student and family can afford to pay.

"K-State doesn't determine need or the eligibility of the student," Evans said. "It is a uniform procedure used by all the colleges in Kansas."

If the student claims independence on the aid application — the parents do not claim him when they file their income tax return — "he needs to be independent almost two years to qualify," Evans said.

Another type of financial aid available at K-State is the Pell Grant, which amounts to $4.5 million of student aid at K-State each year.

The Pell Grant, an award for undergraduates only, is the largest federal student aid program. Unlike a loan, it does not have to be repaid.

With the Pell Grant, a student can receive up to $1,900, depending on the cost of education, whether the student is full-time or part-time and the individual's Student Aid Index.

The aid index is determined by a formula devised by the U. S. Congress. The index is determined from a student's application and is found on the Student Aid Report, which is returned to the student after applying.

The National Direct Student Loan (NDSL) program comprises $1.4 million of the K-State financial aid fund.

The NDSL is a five-percent interest loan that can be used by undergraduates and graduates. The amount a student can receive from the NDSL ranges from $3,000 to $12,000, depending on need and the enrollment status of the student.

Loan repayment places some restrictions on students.

"If a student defaults on any type of loan, he cannot get any other aid," Evans said.

The student must be making satisfactory progress at K-State, according to the University standards. Need must be shown, and the student must be enrolled at least part-time — six credit hours for undergraduates and five credit hours for graduates at K-State.

Loan repayment begins after a six-month grace period following graduation. If the student drops below part-time status, repayment begins then, Evans said.

The work-study program, another form of financial assistance, makes up $850,000 worth of aid each year University students.

"It works just like working in the community," Evans said. "The student gets a monthly paycheck and is paid at least minimum wage."

The total award a student can receive from work-study depends on the individual's need, the amount of money the college has for the program and the amount of aid the student receives from other programs.

The rest of the money K-State gives out as financial aid is divided among other miscellaneous grants, loans and scholarship programs. These programs receive less than $1 million a year total.

A large portion of the scholarship funds go to the Reserve Officer Training Corps (ROTC), a program offered by the U.S. Army and Air Force.

The U.S. Army gives $162,000 a year in scholarships and monthly subsistence. The U.S. Air Force gives $90,000 in scholarships and monthly subsistence yearly. The amounts differ due to a larger number of recruits in the Army ROTC program.

"You just have to be a student at K-State to be eligible for Air Force ROTC," said Lt. Col. Thomas Fryer, head of the Department of Aerospace Studies.

High school students can apply for the ROTC program during their senior year.

"These (high school) students can compete on a national level for a four-year scholarship," Fryer said.

If a student receives this scholarship, a $100-a-month subsistence will be awarded, in addition to tuition, books and lab fees.

After the first two years, all ROTC students receive $100 per month for the junior and senior years.

A student may still join ROTC even though he doesn't win a scholarship. However, the student doesn't receive financial assistance and must pay all expenses the first two years.

Students may apply for a scholarship during their freshman and sophomore years.

Stitches: Working to perfection

Barry Littell, freshman in veterinary medicine, walks Stitches, his Australian shepherd, into the pasture.

Stitches, a blue merle Australian shepherd, was purchased by Littell as a puppy. This breed of dog was first brought to America in the mid-1800's from Australia and New Zealand.

Before herding a group of brood mares at the Horse Teaching and Research Center, Stitches gathers the group.

Rancher's best hand

Stitches, an 11-year-old blue merle Australian shepherd dog, willingly herds cattle and horses while communicating in a language understood only by her and her owner.

This display of loyalty to her master and instinct to herd and protect is a result of natural characteristics bred into her ancestors which are still present in many of today's popular breeds of cattle dogs, particularly the Australian shepherd.

The reliable tool of many stockmen and the dedicated pet of many children, the "Aussie," as it is sometimes called, was first brought to California in the mid-1800s. The original dogs were bred from stock dogs in Australia and New Zealand.

Barry Littell, freshman in veterinary medicine, bought Stitches in 1974 at the Denver National Western Stock Show when she was six weeks old. He has worked her on various types of stock, but mostly on cattle and horses.

For the past few years, Stitches has been in semi-retirement. Since Littell's family has lived in town for the past two years, the dog doesn't often have a chance to work. But she seems to enjoy it when she does.

Stitches and Littell lived alone together for three years before he was married. Now Littell and his wife have two small children, and Stitches has adapted well to family life, Littell said. However, Littell said the Aussie is still a one-person dog — she will do things for him that she won't do for anyone else.

He said Stitches is good with children. When they go outside, she goes out and plays with them and protects them.

Stitches has not adjusted as well to living in the city, Littell said.

"She's a farm dog," Littell said. "You can tell that since we've moved into town, she's not nearly as active as she used to be."

Littell said much instinct was used in training the dog to work stock.

He said some of his training methods might not have been what someone else would have done, but they worked well for him.

"I'm not a professional trainer. For what I did to train her, she worked well enough for me," he said.

Littell begins training young dogs for use around the farm or ranch by introducing them to the livestock.

"I get them out with the animals when they are pups," he said. "You've got to take them out and let them get around the animals to see if there is anything there to work with, to see if they are natural workers."

Once a pup is about three months old, it will start acting interested in the stock by nipping at their heels, Littell said.

When a dog shows some interest in the animals, Littell then teaches it the basic commands of "come," "heel" and "down." A dog also should learn hand movements for these and other commands used when the handler is out of hearing range, he said.

Once an animal has learned these commands, Littell works it in controlled situations. He puts it on a long, light rope and works the dog with the cattle. He also works it in small pens. When he thinks it has progressed enough, he begins to work it in a pasture. He stressed the importance of having control of the dog until it knows what to do.

"The biggest thing is calling it (a dog) off," he said. "If it's running the stock too much or if it's getting a little bit too aggressive, it better understand 'down,' because you don't want it to get too aggressive."

The Australian shepherd is not generally a stock dog that sorts aggressively, Littell said. He said Australian cattle dogs (blue heelers) are more aggressive working dogs, good with more stubborn cattle such as bulls or those in heavy-brush environments.

The Australian shepherds are a little calmer around the animals and are a little bit more docile, Littell said. However, the best dog to use around horses are border collies, because they are even quieter than shepherds, he said.

Although Stitches was an easy dog to train, Littell said he has had enough dogs to know they have to want to do the job to be good workers.

"It's like any other animal. It has to have the interest and ability, and it has to want to learn a little bit. If the dog doesn't want to do it, you can't make it (work)," he said.

Herding is a difficult job for even the best dog. Stitches has really been "through the mill," Littell said. Stitches has been kicked, stomped on and run over, and her working scars include missing teeth, a missing piece of skull bone over one eye and several knots on her ribs. She also has been knocked unconscious several times.

"She gets right back up and goes after it again. She doesn't slow down," he said.

Despite her injuries and her age, Stitches still likes to go out and work, Littell said. If she gets kicked, she may run back and stop, then return to her work. Because she only works occasionally, Littell said Stitches sometimes is mischievous. When he sends her out to work, she may run and get a stick because she wants to play.

Littell said Australian shepherds are, "good family dogs, good farm dogs and just all-around good dogs."

Littell pats Stitches as she keeps a watch on the gate.

"The unlicensed animals could be picked up and held," Morse said. "But where do we hold them? We would need a large building with people to man it. The taxpayers would not stand for that expense and the necessary increase in their taxes."

"If a law cannot be enforced, it should not be on the books. And is the enforcement of a dog licensing law the best place to put our tax dollars?"

The city code states that it is the policy of the city to attempt to find homes for all animals at the animal shelter. Animals are destroyed after 72 hours in the shelter unless owners have been located.

Although the ordinance provides for destroying the animals after 72 hours in the shelter, that course isn't usually followed, officials said.

Dogs are held for three days, then put up for adoption for a minimum of a week if no owner is found. Animals not adopted after a week are subject to being destroyed.

"We do not have euthanasia facilities at the shelter, and are fortunate to have K-State to help us," Vanatta said.

In 1976, the city and the Animal Resource Facility at the University formed an agreement for disposal of animals from the shelter. The University agreed to pick up all unclaimed animals held by the city once a week and to either use the animals in research or destroy them in a humane manner.

"These animals are managed by the Animal Resource Facility under the approval and accreditation of the U.S. Department of Agriculture," said Samuel Kruckenberg, professor of pathology in veterinary science. "We keep careful records of all animals handled, and animals not used for teaching or research may be donated as pets, but for no other use."

"The problem is not with wild dogs — animals that have never had an owner — but owned dogs which are uncared for, unsupervised or abandoned," said Dr. Anne B. Collins, a veterinarian and shelter coordinator. Collins oversees a monthly average of 100 dogs brought in to be reclaimed by the owner, adopted or destroyed.

Dogs brought into the shelter have a good chance for survival.

"The national average rate of animals destroyed by official shelters or pounds is 50 percent. In Manhattan, the average is 30 percent. Nearly 30 percent of the owners will reclaim their dogs, and the rest — 50 percent — are adopted," she said.

Policy ties aid to rights

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House approved legislation Tuesday tying continued U.S. aid to El Salvador to improvements in that nation's human rights policies and an end to right-wing death squads.

The legislation, approved by voice vote, would require that the Reagan administration certify every six months that the U.S.-supported government in El Salvador is making a "concerted and significant effort" to guarantee human rights to its citizens and was reigning in its military forces to end "indiscriminate torture and murder of civilians...."

The bill would also condition U.S. military aid on progress in land reform in El Salvador, on negotiations with communist-led guerrillas and on evidence that the government was seriously investigating the deaths of Americans in the country.

During a congressional recess last December, President Reagan used a pocket veto — a legislative device under which legislation dies without a presidential signature — to kill an identical El Salvador certification measure.

Some members of Congress are challenging that veto in court, but supporters of the legislation decided to go ahead and approve a new certification bill which now goes to the Republican-led Senate which has also passed the legislation.

In fiscal 1984, the United States is providing $64.8 million in military aid. The administration is expected to request another $150 million.

The total since 1979 is $1 billion, about one-third military and two-thirds economic.

Riley County pet neglect increases

Local ordinances require the City of Manhattan to provide for the care or disposal of unwanted, stray or abandoned dogs. Deserted cats, however, are left to the mercy of individuals who will adopt them or find them other homes.

"When someone has a problem with a stray cat, he has three options," said Beverly Hashagen, a Manhattan resident who operates Pet Hotline, a 24-hour clearing-house that attempts to find homes for unwanted pets. "First, he can call one of the local, commercial kennels which functions as a shelter. Second, he can call Pet Hotline and list the animal for reclaiming or possible adoption. I will try to provide him with other possible options. Third, he can follow up on all of those options."

Hashagen said the main problem with pet owners in Riley County is that some aren't responsible for their animals.

"If they want a pet, they must accept the responsibilities. They can't expect a shelter or kennel to solve their problems when the pet is no longer wanted."

Pet Hotline receives three to five calls a day, Hashagen said. During holidays and severe weather, that number usually increases, she said.

Recently, Hashagen said, she has observed the development of a situation she attributes to the effect national economic recession has on the local community.

"Since a year ago last October, there have been more calls than usual about abandoned animals and cruelty to animals," Hashagen said. "In following up on those calls, the police have found not only neglected animals, but children not much better off. I haven't seen a definite improvement yet of the local situation."

The Riley County Police Department doesn't keep records which would support or dispute Hashagen's observation, a dispatcher said.

"She (Hashagen) might know about some cases where animals and children are being neglected, but we file records according to types of calls, and cruelty to animals and child neglect are two different types of calls," the dispatcher said.

Aquino steps into void left by slain brother

By The Associated Press

MANILA, Philippines — Five months after his brother was assassinated at the Manila International Airport, Agapito "Butz" Aquino is emerging as a major opposition figure in the Philippines.

A former plastics manufacturer and onetime actor in a cough syrup commercial, Aquino, 44, wasn't widely known before Benigno Aquino's Aug. 21 killing, and has little political experience.

But opposition demonstrators now chant "Butz" along with "Ninoy," the nickname of his brother.

No other opposition leader has so far appeared likely to fill Benigno Aquino's role as President Ferdinand E. Marcos' chief rival. Marcos, 66, has indicated he will run for reelection in the 1987 election, and some local observers are projecting Agapito Aquino as an opposition candidate. But Aquino says he is not ready to run for office.

Benigno Aquino had been jailed for eight years by Marcos, who was then ruling under martial law. Martial law was lifted in 1981, and last summer Aquino ended three years of voluntary exile in the United States, vowing to help opposition efforts against Marcos. But the 50-year-old former senator was gunned down at the Manila airport on arrival. His killing has not been solved.

Agapito Aquino's picture has appeared on magazine covers. A tabloid published by the opposition-oriented Mr. and Ms. magazine dealing almost exclusively with the aftermath of the assassination featured Aquino declaring, "If Ninoy could only see me now."

He has acknowledged that some of the affection for his older brother has been transferred to him.

An article in the tabloid quoted him as saying he has three major assets: "First, I look like Ninoy. Second, I sound like Ninoy. And third, I don't have a first lady," a reference to first lady Imelda Marcos, a target of much opposition criticism.

On Sunday, a dramatic march ended with Aquino and a circle of 20 followers gathering at the airport tarmac where his brother fell. Aquino read a pledge to carry on his brother's fight.

Police had backed down and allowed the marchers through a blockade after Aquino insisted on taking at least 1,000 people to the airport and a small delegation to the tarmac itself.

A week earlier, he won a similar confrontation with riot police, negotiating with three generals to let him lead a march through Manila.

Aquino, father of three, has been separated from his wife, but she has joined some of his rallies. Aquino and other members of his family, including the late senator's mother, son and widow, have been giving speeches at rallies and civic clubs all over the islands.

The family members bring more enthusiastic reaction than the dozens of former senators, congressmen or constitutional convention delegates among the opposition who have failed to regain power during Marcos' 16-year rule.

Last month, Aquino organized a conference of quarreling opposition groups, with the result that a 15-member council of leaders was formed.

A lawyer, who asked not to be identified, said there has been malicious speculation that Marcos might be allowing Aquino victories in his confrontations with military blockades to build up the image of an inexperienced man he thinks he can handle.

During the most recent showdown between Aquino supporters and riot police, as Aquino spoke to the crowd from atop a small truck, an opposition lawyer turned to a police colonel and said, "I hope he doesn't become another Bobby Kennedy."

Commissioner to attend hearing on tax increment finance proposal

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

Members of the city planning staff are to attend a Kansas Senate committee hearing on tax increment finance legislation today in Topeka, the Manhattan City Commission voted Tuesday night.

City Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood said Tuesday afternoon that she also would attend the hearing before the Local Government Committee of the Senate and would testify.

The decision to send city staff to Topeka developed from a discussion on tax increment financing and how it relates to funding of the downtown redevelopment project.

Tax increment financing, in the case of downtown, involves the freezing of the tax base for 20 years. All money from tax increases in that area would go to pay bond costs. Should property taxes fall due to reappraisal or other causes, problems could arise in servicing the debts on the bonds.

Community Development Director Gary Stith said plans for downtown redevelopment are designed under the current tax increment plan, so new legislation would not adversely affect redevelopment.

"The project is structured in such a way that we can work under the existing legislation," Stith said. "There could be some potential advantages by certain sections of this bill being passed."

Even though he voted to send the delegation to Topeka, Commissioner Eugene Klingler said he is in favor of keeping the situation as it is.

"As Gary said, we don't need this (legislation) to do the project," Klingler said. "As far as I'm concerned, that's the way it ought to be played."

But Lindamood, a strong supporter of the new legislation, said that under the existing act, tax increment bonds used to finance redevelopment might not be marketable and could put Manhattan into a "high risk situation."

"Just what happens if there's (reappraisal) and suddenly businesses pay half the rate they pay now?" Lindamood asked. "It makes it a very risky bond and very hard to sell."

"Actually, I think if people want the project to go through, they would be supporting this because it makes it marketable and makes it less costly."

Also, she said, it calls for a referendum because public cost is involved.

"If there were a vote, when would it be?" Lindamood asked Stith. "Would it be before demolition or on thirty acres of rubble?"

The vote probably would be after the project area is cleared, Stith said, but it is within the commission's authority to place the referendum preceding clearing.

In other action, the commission appointed Vector Corp. as a relocation consultant for businesses being displaced for redevelopment. City Manager Don Harmon said he received favorable references about the corporation's past work in Wisconsin. Vector's vice president will be the on-site consultant in charge, officials said.

Lindamood voted against the measure "for reasons I've already indicated to Mr. Stith, but don't feel appropriate to bring up here."

An ordinance to close Fifth Street to allow heavy equipment to be used for renovation of the County Courthouse was approved on second reading. This ordinance makes way for part of the proposed courthouse plaza area. Lindamood and Commissioner Dave Fiser voted against the closing.

Rape occurs early Tuesday

A Manhattan woman in her 20s entered her car in the northwest part of the city early Tuesday and was raped by a man wearing a ski mask. Riley County Police Department spokesmen said the man had been hiding in the vehicle.

The woman was interviewed by police at a local hospital shortly after the 7 a.m. incident, but details of the rape were still sketchy last night.

The woman sustained no physical injuries beyond those from the rape, police said. It had not been determined whether a weapon was used in the attack.

Authorities released no additional information about the incident.

No. 13 MU to battle Lady 'Cats for Big Eight Conference lead

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

It will be a pivotal Big Eight Conference match tonight as the 11th-ranked Lady 'Cats basketball squad collides with the 13th-rated University of Missouri Lady Tigers in Columbia.

Both K-State and Missouri sit atop the Big Eight standings with identical 5-1 marks. The Lady Tigers lost their only conference game to Oklahoma State University, losing 80-78 at Stillwater. K-State took at narrow 76-71 victory over the Cowgirls, but lost a 71-58 decision to the University of Kansas, who was defeated by MU, 71-62.

Missouri enters tonight's contest averaging 90 points a contest while holding its opponents to 63.7. The Lady Tigers have never lost a game by more than two points and lead the Big Eight in both team offense and defense.

K-State currently is fourth in the Big Eight in team offense, averaging 75.8 points a game. The Lady 'Cats rank second in field goal percentage — connecting on 50 percent of their shots — and their 38.7 rebound average is the fourth highest. Missouri ranks first in each of these categories.

Missouri is led by five players averaging double figures, including 6-foot senior Joni Davis, who is hitting 20.3 points per contest. Mary Brueggstrass averages 14.5 per game, followed by Sarah Campbell with 12.2, Debbie Walker with 12.1 and Dee Dee Polk with 11.3. Polk also leads the Big Eight in assists, averaging eight per contest.

K-State will counter the Missouri attack with the inside play of senior Angie Bonner and sophomore Tina Dixon. Bonner, a 6-foot-1 junior, is averaging 13.5 points a game, while Dixon is coming off a 19-point performance on Saturday against the University of Nebraska. Sophomore Jennifer Jones, who scored 14 points in K-State's 96-75 win over Nebraska, contributes 11 points a game, while guards Sheronda Jenkins and Cassandra Jones also add double-figure scoring for the Lady 'Cats, averaging 12 and 10 points, respectively.

Missouri won two of the three contests against K-State last season, including a 75-65 victory in the Big Eight post-season tournament championship game. The winner of tonight's contest will take sole possession of first place berth in the conference.

"Missouri is one of the finest teams we'll ever play all year," Head Coach Lynn Hickey said. "What makes it even tougher is that the Missouri-Kansas State game has become a rivalry. It will be an emotionally-packed game as well as a physical one. If we can utilize our quickness and have Tina Dixon stronger by Wednesday, it will be a very close game."

K-State's Carlisa Thomas descends to the floor after rebounding the ball in a recent game against Iowa State University. The Lady 'Cats meet the Missouri Tigers tonight in Columbia.

Lone wolves take part in medal hunt

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — The Olympic Village, teeming with athletes preparing for the 1984 Games, includes its share of lone wolves — one-man teams who will march proudly in today's opening ceremonies, bearing the flags of their nations.

Erroll Frazier of the Virgin Islands is believed to be the first black speed skater in Olympic history. George Tucker, a graduate physics student from Menands, N.Y., will hurdle down the luge chute for Puerto Rico.

Lamine Gueye, a dancer and singer, will ski for Senegal and Jamil el Reedy will come down the slopes for Egypt. Monaco's man on the hill is David Lajoux. Mexico's single entry is skier Hubertus von Hohenlohe, a descendant of Austrian royalty.

In all, 49 countries will compete in the Games, and a handful have more officials than athletes. Their chances of coming away with medals are slim, but they will be able to say they were here, that for the first time, their nations were represented in the Winter Games.

The International Olympic Committee, encouraging wider participation in the Games, is underwriting some of the smaller delegations' expenses.

Tucker was born in Puerto Rico and lived there for about five years. "I know the people and I feel close to them," he said.

He is relatively new to the luge and has had his share of problems training for the event. He knows he cannot win. "I have a 75 percent completion figure," he said. "That's good for a quarterback, but not so good for a luger."

Where will he finish here? "Maybe alongside the track," he said. "I hope not, though."

Frazier was a late entry, and his addition to the Games when organizing officials learned that Denmark would not be sending a delegation kept the number of participating countries at 49.

Monaco is represented by eight people, including the single skier, Lajoux, 17; his grandmother, who serves as head of the small country's delegation; and his grandfather, the technical director.

Jacqueline Lajoux says she is her grandson's coach.

"She skis," he said, "very slowly, but she skis."

El Reedy spent 40 days in a cave in the Sahara preparing for the Games, part of the training regimen designed by his father to toughen the Egyptian-born skier, who grew up in Plattsburgh, N.Y.

"I know an Egyptian skier in the Olympics sounds weird," said his father, Hatem el Reedy. "We hear jokes. 'Did he train by sliding down the Pyramids?' I laugh and say, 'Didn't you know? The Pyramids have snow on top.'"

Gueye said "Skiing is science fiction," in Senegal, where the highest mountain is 400 feet.

California has ripest recruiting pasture

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A runner who once gained 500 yards in a single game and an all-around athlete some experts feel could jump right into the pros are among the top prizes being sought this week by college football recruiters.

Today is national letter-of-intent day. Traditionally, about 90 percent of all recruited players make their decision within two or three days of national signing day, and this is the week that warring recruiters are most active.

Most experts say California has the most prospects this year, with Texas and Florida as fertile as usual.

Southern California has produced two of the three best running backs — Ryan Knight of Riverside and Gaston Green of Gardena — according to information gathered by the NCAA, which annually compiles a list of top prospects to more closely monitor their recruitment.

"California seems to be turning out as many prospects this year as any state or region," said Dale Smith of the NCAA, who has been helping coordinate this year's program. "Texas and Florida are always hotbeds of recruiting. And Ohio may not have the same big numbers, but Ohio has a top group of five or 10 who would rank right up there with any other state."

No single player seems to dominate this class, as Herschel Walker and Marcus Dupree did theirs, Smith said. But every school in the country covets the 6-foot-2, 200-pound Knight, who rushed for 501 yards on 31 carries in a game last season. Knight scored on runs of 68, 56, 36 and 49 yards and had 125 yards wiped out by penalty.

The 6-foot, 195-pound Green "has been compared with Tony Dorsett in his running style," Smith said. The third top running back, Craig Heyward of Passaic, N.J., is a fullback type at 6-foot, 235 pounds. "He runs the 40-yard dash in 4.5 seconds and bench presses 390 pounds," Smith said.

Perhaps the best quarterback is Rodney Peete, son of Kansas City Chiefs assistant coach Willie Peete. Peete, who announced Tuesday that he will attend Southern California, also is a standout baseball and basketball player, and at least one coach swears he could be playing wide receiver in the National Football League right now.

U.S. hockey team falls to Canada

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — Olympic ice hockey moved from the political arena to the rink Tuesday. Canada settled one question by beating the defending Olympic champions from the United States 4-2 in the first day of competition at the 1984 Winter Games.

An inspired Canadian team, playing without two squad members declared ineligible on Monday, exacted some measure of retribution from the United States with the victory and dimmed U.S. prospects of winning the hockey gold medal in a second straight Olympics.

Carey Wilson scored three of Canada's goals, and David A. Jensen scored both for the United States. Jensen's goal at 13:54 of the second period pulled the Americans within one, 3-2, but Wilson put the game away with a goal at 9:19 of the third period.

"The most disappointing thing," said U.S. Coach Lou Vairo, "is that we didn't play to our abilities, and Canada played to their fullest ability."

The United States now faces the unenviable task of beating mighty Czechoslovakia Thursday night to have any chance of advancing to the medals round.

After three months of squabbling between the U.S. Olympic Committee and Canadian officials over the definition of "professionalism," the U.S. and Canadian teams took hockey out of the conference rooms and onto the ice.

With the Olympic Flame arriving today to herald the start of the Games, the IOC met with officials of the International Ice Hockey Federation to end the squabble.

Thomas leads Tigers as they host K-State

The K-State men's basketball team will meet the University of Missouri Tigers in a Big Eight Conference game at 8:05 p.m. today at Hearn Center.

The Tigers will be trying to rebound from a 76-65 setback against the University of Oklahoma last Saturday. A bright spot in the loss was the play of 6-foot-7 Malcolm Thomas. The junior forward scored 34 points and grabbed 11 rebounds in a losing cause. For his play during last week's action, Thomas was named the Big Eight Player of the Week.

Thomas' 18.5 points per game average leads three Missouri starters who are scoring in double figures. Center Greg Cavenner scores at 12.3 points per game clip and guard Prince Bridges has a 10.1 average.

Missouri has displayed good depth this season — relying on eight players to contribute.

"We feel we are eight deep and can spot some people," said Missouri Head Coach Norm Stewart.

The Tigers are currently 3-3 in conference play and 14-7 overall.

The Wildcats will be trying to bounce back from a tough 47-46 loss to the University of Nebraska. A tip-in shot by the Cornhuskers' Ronnie Smith with 7 seconds remaining gave Nebraska the victory.

The loss left the Wildcats with a 1-5 conference record and an overall record of 9-10.

The game features the seventh and eight-winningest active coaches in the nation in Stewart and K-State Head Coach Jack Hartman, respectively. Stewart's coaching record is currently 413-202 and Hartman is 404-199.

In other conference basketball action tonight, Kansas will travel to Oklahoma State, Nebraska will host Oklahoma and Iowa State University will face the University of Colorado at Boulder.

Committee to consider multibank bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Senate President Ross Doyen said Tuesday he will offer to the Senate Commercial and Financial Institutions Committee at its meeting this morning a bill to legalize multibank holding companies in Kansas.

The committee, headed by Sen. Neil Arasmith, R-Phillipsburg, is virtually certain to introduce the bill in the Senate for Doyen, breaking a stalemate over the form the bill should take.

Previous lobbying efforts on behalf of multibank holding companies have generally focused on legislation which simply would remove the present prohibition on corporations owning controlling interest in more than one bank.

However, Doyen, R-Concordia, said his proposed bill would take a somewhat different approach.

In trying to achieve a compromise which would remove rural legislators' opposition to opening up the state's banking system to permit banks to acquire an unlimited number of other banks, Doyen said he has had drafted a bill which answers two of the arguments against it.

Those arguments are that local banks would lose their autonomy and local townspeople would no longer have any control over them, and that the big banks would siphon capital out of the smaller towns to be able to make big loans in the metropolitan areas.

Without giving all the specifics, Doyen said his measure would have provisions in it requiring the banks which acquire smaller banks to keep local people on the board of directors and to limit the amount of money the bigger banks could take out of a community.

"We need to update our banking laws to stay competitive," Doyen said. "The bill I will present to the committee will contain some safeguards, requiring that a majority of the directors in a bank have to be from the community and insuring that they don't suck all the capital out of those communities."

"I'm going to get the matter aired before the committee and resolved one way or another."

Another meeting of the Senate committee passed Tuesday without a bill being presented which would legalize multibank holding companies.

Arasmith admitted he was puzzled by the delay by lobbyists supporting multibank, which was supposed to be one of the hot issues of the 1984 session of the Legislature.

Under Kansas law, corporations can own only one bank outright and no more than 25 percent interest in any other banks. If multibank holding companies were legalized, they would be able to own any number of banks.

Promoters of multibank argue Kansas banks must be given the freedom to grow in order to accumulate the kind of capital that is needed to finance large construction projects. Opponents see legalization of multibank holding companies as a step toward centralization of the state's banking system and the loss of autonomy for small, hometown banks.

Rep. Harold Dyck, R-Hesston, chairman of the House Commercial and Financial Institutions Committee, stopped just short of declaring multibank dead as an issue in the House this session.

"I just don't want to mess with it," Dyck said Tuesday. "I'd like to see it tried in the Senate to see if there is any interest in it over there."

"I don't feel like I want to put my committee members through the stress and strain like last year. I just don't want to run them through the mill this year."

"I believe, because it's an election year, there are a lot of members who don't want to mess with it. They want to let it lie."

Arasmith confirmed he is not pleased by the delay in introduction of the measure to legalize multibank holding companies.

"I don't appreciate the delay," said Arasmith, chairman of the Senate committee, through which the bill is supposed to be introduced.

"I want to get it in, work it and vote it up or down. But you can't work it if you don't have it."

Former state Administration Secretary Patrick Hurley, chief lobbyist for the organization promoting multibank, has been invited four times to submit a bill to his committee, Arasmith said.

"I've practically guaranteed the committee would agree to introduce it, as much as you can guarantee that," said Arasmith. "But I've not heard one word, from Hurley or anybody else."

He said there also was speculation the Senate Ways and Means Committee might be asked to introduce the multibank bill, but that Sen. Paul Hess of Wichita, the chairman of that panel, hasn't heard from the backers of the proposal, either.

"I've got to assume they've got to come in sooner or later," said Arasmith. "They've admitted they aren't sure they've got the votes, but I don't think it's that obvious. They can't know where the votes are until we get a bill."

Arasmith said one possible reason for the delay is the proponents are trying to draft a proposal which would put enough limitations on the multibank holding companies that the issue would not draw so much opposition from legislators from small and mid-sized towns.

Dyck said he believes backers of multibank have virtually decided that another year of educating legislators on the issue is needed before making an all-out push to get the law changed. Next year, which is not an election year, would provide a more "relaxed" atmosphere for the lobbyists, he said.

Study rates colleges; professor picks best

By The College Press Service

NORTHRIDGE, Calif. — Eight of every 10 undergraduate programs are only "adequate" or worse, according to a just-released study.

The study, based on solicited and unsolicited opinions of college deans, also said state colleges and universities are generally better education buys than private colleges.

French and Soviet graduate schools, moreover, generally are better than American graduate schools, Dr. Jack Gourman, a political science professor at California State University-Northridge, found in his compilation of academicians' opinions released last week.

Gourman has published his rankings of schools for the last 30 years. He said he does not get too many irate responses from people whose schools are slighted.

"We do get those who believe their schools should be ranked higher, but not often," he said.

Among his more controversial assertions this year is that many state public colleges are better education buys than private ones. He said Berkeley "compares favorably" with Stanford, recently ranked in a U.S. News and World Report magazine survey as the best undergraduate program in the country.

Pennsylvania State University-University Park, Gourman said, "is competitive" with the private University of Pennsylvania-Philadelphia and Carnegie-Mellon University-Pittsburgh. The University of Illinois-Urbana is "neck and neck" with the independent University of Chicago, he said.

But many states do not have even one college that rates above "good," Gourman said.

Among these are Alabama, Alaska, Delaware, Hawaii, Idaho, Kentucky, Mississippi, Montana, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Carolina, South Dakota, Vermont and West Virginia.

The best schools, he said, are the University of Indiana-Bloomington; New York State University-Buffalo; Ohio State University-Columbus; University of Virginia-Charlottesville; University of Washington-Seattle; and the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

Bill bans discrimination of military

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Some private clubs in Kansas discriminate against military personnel by denying them club memberships, a Senate committee was told Tuesday.

"Enlisted soldiers stationed in Kansas, and in particular at Fort Riley, often have been denied acceptance into private clubs serving alcoholic beverages solely on the basis of their status as enlisted men," said Col. John Sobraske, deputy post commander at Fort Riley.

"It is only fair that our soldiers, who stand ready to defend the state of Kansas, have the same access to social establishments as do its citizens."

Sen. Edward Reilly, R-Leavenworth and chairman of the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee which is conducting hearings on the measure, asked Sobraske whether the private clubs' denials were due to fights and brawls soldiers have gotten into at some private clubs.

"We have had negotiations with particular clubs that have had these kind of problems," Sobraske said.

The measure Sobraske supported would make it illegal for a private club to deny a person membership on the basis of that person's military status or rank.

No action was taken Tuesday but Reilly said the committee might act on the bill today along with two other measures it heard testimony on Tuesday.

Sen. Bill Morris, R-Wichita, said he thought the Legislature might be overstepping its bounds if it required private clubs to accept certain people for membership.

"As a private club, they have the right to decide who their members will be as long as they are not violating civil rights statutes," Morris said.

Thomas Kennedy, the director of the state Division of Alcoholic Beverage Control, echoed Morris' concern.

"Private clubs can reject applications for membership for any reason," Kennedy said.

The division supports the purpose of the measure, Kennedy said, but it has reservations about the form the measure has taken.

"This whole matter falls under the issue of discrimination," he said.

Kennedy said he had fewer reservations about another measure the committee is studying which would allow military personnel temporary ly stationed in Kansas to apply for a temporary membership at a private club. If the application was accepted by the club, the measure allows the minimum 10-day waiting period and minimum $10 fee called for in existing state law to be waived.

"Although the division has no position on the measure, we feel it would have a positive impact on visitors to the state," he said.

Kennedy testified against a third measure which would eliminate the residency requirements for a person who wants to obtain a license to operate a private club.

State law requires that anyone applying for a private club operating license must have lived in Kansas at least 5 years, and at least one year in the county where the club is located.

"The residency requirements show that the applicant has demonstrated some level of stability and local commitment to obtain a license," Kennedy said.

Kennedy said he did not object to reducing the county residency requirement to between three and six months.

Rev. Richard Taylor, lobbyist for Kansans for Life at its Best, urged the committee to kill all three bills.

"What concerns us is the continued relaxation of alcohol control laws," he said.

Police, utility workers join forces to stop sexual assaults in Detroit

By The Associated Press

DETROIT — Mayor Coleman A. Young on Tuesday ordered beefed-up police patrols and asked utility workers to serve as the city's "eyes and ears" to help combat increasing sexual attacks on schoolgirls.

"If there's one person raped a year, that's too many," Young told a meeting of police, school, business and religious leaders. "We will get a grip on this problem, we will stop the rape of our women and our schoolchildren."

Sam Gardner, chief judge of Detroit's Records Court, announced that suspects accused of violent rapes will be brought to trial within 90 days of being arrested.

"We hope that by doing this we will be able to cut into this problem," he said. "Only a small number of persons are committing a large number of these crimes."

More than 50 schoolgirls have been raped in the past year, including three in the past two weeks, according to police. The incidents have not been confined to any particular neighborhood, but have been spread across the city.

Young said almost 3,000 radio-equipped vehicles belonging to local gas, electric and telephone companies will immediately become part of a special program to combat rape.

"Not much is going to move out there without being seen by these eyes and ears," the mayor said.

The utility vehicles will display special decals identifying them "as places that provide help for young people and old people," Young said. He added that a special communications system will be set up between the police department and radio rooms of the utilities to speed police response if a crime is reported by a utility employee.

Al Glancy, a representative of Michigan Consolidated Gas Co., said the program "reaffirms our civic responsibility to serve notice to those who would commit crimes against our children that we will not permit it."

The mayor also ordered police to patrol along school routes during hours when students are present and to deploy plainclothes surveillance teams in areas around schools.

He said the hours of the department's tactical, youth and traffic sections will be revised to give more staff to the school patrols.

Young said 23 of the rapes reported since the beginning of 1983 have been solved. Since the arrest of three suspects last month, the number of assaults against schoolgirls had dropped by 60 percent, he said.

Deputy Police Chief Richard Dungy said media reports had exaggerated the rape problem. Sexual assaults in Detroit rose 37 percent last year, but Houston and Chicago had even greater increases, he said.

"Let's not get caught up in numbers," Dungy said. "Let's all continue to be duly concerned but let's not panic about what's going on here."

Kansas railroads challenge bill requiring manned cabooses

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The cost of using manned cabooses on Kansas trains will drive freight rates up and threatens to force small railroads in the state out of business, a House committee was told Tuesday.

In addition, the quarrel over cabooses — the safety they provide and the need for them — should be left to labor-management negotiations and not dragged before the Legislature, a railroad association spokesman said Tuesday.

"Cabooses are a throwback to another era of railroading," said Pat Hubbell, spokesman for the Kansas Railroad Association. "Forty-six states do not require occupied cabooses. Why should Kansas saddle its citizens with unnecessary rail transportation costs?"

The testimony came as the House Transportation Committee continued hearings on a bill that would require all trains at least 1,000 feet and longer to pull a manned caboose. No action was taken on the bill.

Mark Schenewerk, superintendent of the Kyle Railroad Company in Phillipsburg, told the committee passage of a proposal would have serious repercussions for his company.

"This legislation would mean a 50 percent increase in our cost of labor," Schenewerk said. "We'd have to add a crew member plus the cost of buying new cabooses. That would be about a $300,000 immediate cash outlay and our company just couldn't afford that right now."

Schenewerk's company operates on 300 miles of former Rock Island Railroad track between Goodland and Clay Center.

The railroad currently pulls no cabooses on its trains, which Schenewerk said average from 15 to 30 cars in length, usually in daylight. In addition, he said the trains run mostly on 10 mph track, which reduces any danger.

"We've operated since about February 1981 and we're trying to add another 100 miles of Rock Island line," he said. "We are currently operating trains in Kansas without cabooses and we're doing it safely."

Hubbell took exception to testimony Monday by railroad union spokesmen who said railroad owners don't care about the safety of their employees. He also challenged a union claim railroads would not save money by eliminating cabooses on most trains.

"Railroads are the most safety-conscious industry in the country because they're one of the most dangerous industries in the country," Hubbell told the House Transportation Committee.

"There's no way railroads are going to eliminate all cabooses. But if you pass this legislation, the cost of operating railroads in Kansas will be substantially higher than operating anywhere else."

He said cabooses cost about $82,000 apiece and have an average life of 25 years. Add the cost of upkeep and Hubbell said the cars are an expensive item.

"As an observer of a train, a person in the caboose can't see that much," Hubbell said. "But cabooses will still be used on extra long trains, on grain movements and coal trains and to help switching."

"But we want the right to make the decision on whether a caboose is needed at the management level."

Hubbell said sophisticated heat sensing equipment, automatic switching and signalling, wide-load detectors and other computerization has eliminated the need for cabooses on every train.

He also noted a 1980 study by the Interstate Commerce Commission which concluded a railroad could safely operate without manned cabooses. Also, Hubbell cited a presidential emergency board decision two years later which said manned cabooses were not needed to ensure safety.

Also, he said there are plenty of trains operating safely without cabooses including European railroads, a Florida line, and in Kansas, the Hutchinson & Northern, the Garden City Western, the Kyle and Amtrak, which only carries human cargo, operate without cabooses.

Testimony promotes child safety seats

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Child safety seats save lives in automobile accidents, according to legislators and doctors who testified Tuesday in support of a proposal to expand and toughen the state's existing child safety restraint law.

State Reps. Stephen Cloud, R-Lenexa, and Edgar Moore, R-Olathe, told the House Public Health and Welfare Committee stories of accidents involving children they knew — one ending in tragedy, the other in near-disaster.

"I am for this bill on account of Jimmy," Moore said, recalling a foster child who was adopted but never got the chance to grow up with his new family after waiting and getting through all the "red tape" of adoption proceedings.

"Jimmy was in an automobile accident and Jimmy lost his life."

Cloud's story had a happier ending.

He told his colleagues about his sister-in-law and an automobile accident she had two years ago. The car flipped over, rolling twice, with the woman and her three children strapped in by seatbelts and other restraints inside.

Legislators, doctors recount tragedies

The rolling car finally came to rest on its roof, and Cloud's sister-in-law and the three children were hanging, upside down, from their seatbelts.

"If she hadn't had those three strapped in, I would be standing before you today with three fewer nieces and nephews," Cloud said.

Both favored a bill before the committee which would require parents and legal guardians to use child safety seats whenever they are transporting children ages 4 and younger in an automobile. In addition, the bill also calls for a $10 fine against violators.

The committee took no action Tuesday.

Current law, enacted in 1981, requires child safety seats for children 2 years and younger. However, there is no penalty provision in the law. The only penalty is an oral reprimand from law enforcement officials and proponents of the new legislation say the lack of a penalty makes the current law useless.

"The one, which we did pass, is unenforceable," said Rep. Jessie Branson, D-Lawrence and advocate of the original act three years ago.

"In 1982, accident records show that 5,822 children under 5 years of age were involved in accidents," Mrs. Branson said. "The result was 14 fatalities and 74 incapacitating injuries. In accidents where a child restraint device was in use, there were no fatalities and only five incapacitating injuries."

Art Cherry, a Topeka pediatrician, said automobile accidents were "the No. 1 cause of injury and death of children" and he supported the proposal to expand the child safety act.

"It is extremely dangerous for an infant or child of any age to be transported in an automobile without protection," Cherry said. "Children are at the mercy of a person who finds it inconvenient or too expensive to use a safety restraint."

"I'd like you to sit with me in the emergency room of Stormont Vail hospital with the parents of a child who is unconscious as the result of an automobile accident."

"That is a human suffering you can prevent."

Ted McFarlane, director of the Douglas County ambulance service, also urged passage of the bill.

"There is no doubt that the child safety seat is a lifesaver," McFarlane said. "No one can take on a windshield, doorpost or dash of a car and win."

Rep. Marvin Littlejohn, R-Phillipsburg and committee chairman, said the panel might act on the bill as early as Thursday.

Other groups supporting the bill included: the Kansas Highway Patrol, the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, the Kansas Fraternal Order of Police, the Kansas Parent-Teachers Association, the Kansas Head Injury Association and a variety of medical, insurance and political organizations.

Tracy Turner and friends celebrate at the Theta Xi house following the announcement of the run-off.

Heinz, Turner vie in presidential run-off

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer and
LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

The campaign continues. Ken Heinz, junior in computer science, and Tracy Turner, junior in economics, received the most votes for student body president in Wednesday's student body elections and will vie for the position in a run-off election Feb. 15.

Heinz received 1,143 votes; Turner, 905; Dana Hawkins, senior in journalism and mass communications, 719; and Eddie Rodriguez, junior in pre-law, 479.

Parties were going at both Haymaker Hall and the Theta Xi fraternity house as the candidates waited for telephone calls that would confirm election victory hopes. Relief was Heinz's main reaction when he received the good news. He had been waiting in his room in Haymaker, while a group of supporters waited nervously a few doors away.

Heinz was asked why he believed he got the most votes in the general election.

"It's hard to say," he said. "People voted for a candidate I think with which they felt comfortable."

Improved campus lighting, one of Heinz's main issues in the general election, will continue to play a major role in the run-off campaign.

"Lighting was one of my big issues," he said. "A lot of people are concerned with it and want something done about it."

Heinz congratulated his supporters, saying everyone did a "great job." He said he hopes they will be able to continue strong support for another week.

"This is just the first round," Heinz said. "If people don't vote the second time, the first time doesn't count."

Heinz said he didn't anticipate which candidate he would be facing in the run-off election, but is expecting a tough race.

"Tracy is a good candidate," he said. "I think it will be a really strong run-off."

Turner and a group of his supporters were gathered at the Theta Xi house when the call came through.

"We're in the run-off!" Turner told the crowd assembled near the telephone.

"We've got a lot of work to do, you guys."

The champagne cork popped and Turner proposed a toast. "To some of the greatest people I have ever had the opportunity with which to work," he said.

Turner said student recruitment will still be a major issue in his run-off campaign.

"I'm not going to do anything radically different," he said. "I believe attracting new students to the University is the biggest problem facing the student body president in the next administration."

Experience will be another important issue.

"I believe my three years at the University have given me the range of experience needed for the position," Turner said.

He said his strategy will remain much the same in the run-off as in the general election.

"We have no new strategy," he said. "We'll talk to as many people as possible and play it straight forward, just like we were before. We will go head-to-head with Heinz, and I expect he'll do the same."

A total of 3,423 students voted in the election, 118 less than the 3,541 who turned out to the polls a year ago. Last year's total represented an increase of 547 over 1981 figures.

States push to increase drinking age

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The highway death toll among young drinking drivers, especially underage youths who cross state borders to drink legally, is the target of scores of bills in state legislatures that are aimed at raising the legal drinking age.

"There is a tremendous amount of interest in raising the drinking age throughout the country," said John Moulden of the National Transportation Safety Board as he scanned a computer printout of alcohol-related legislation being debated across the country.

He estimated more than 200 proposals have been introduced in various state legislatures.

The problem of teen-age drinking was cited by President Reagan's commission on drunken driving, which urged in December after an 18-month study that Congress set a legal drinking age of 21 and cut federal highway funds to a state that fails to enforce it.

"There is evidence of a direct correlation between the minimum drinking age and alcohol-related crashes among the age groups affected," the commission stated.

The National Safety Council in Chicago estimated about half the 46,000 traffic deaths in the United States in 1982 were alcohol-related. A report by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration found eight states that raised the legal drinking age showed an average 28 percent annual reduction in nighttime fatal accidents involving drivers aged 18 to 21.

Only 19 states have a drinking age of 21 for all alcohol: Alaska, Arkansas, California, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Utah and Washington.

Four states, Vermont, Hawaii, Louisiana and Wisconsin, have the lowest legal drinking age of 18. Wisconsin has enacted a 19-year-old drinking age, which goes in effect July 1.

U.S. battleship blasts rebel strongholds in Beirut

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — The giant guns of the battleship New Jersey pounded the rebel-held hills beyond Beirut all day Wednesday in a thundering barrage that brought the United States in firmly on the government side in Lebanon's civil war.

On Beirut's southern edge, meanwhile, 1,400 U.S. Marines waited for orders sending them back to their ships offshore under President Reagan's announcement Tuesday that they would be withdrawn from their perilous position in the coming weeks.

The small British contingent of the multinational force pulled out Wednesday and Italy ordered a gradual withdrawal of its force.

Lebanon's U.S.-backed Christian president, Amin Gemayel, also appeared to be in an ever more precarious spot. His army's 6th Brigade said it was defecting to the side of the Moslem rebels, who held Moslem-populated west Beirut.

The New Jersey opened up with its 16-inch guns — the biggest afloat — at 1:25 p.m. after artillery shells began raining down on Christian east Beirut and around suburban Yarze, near the U.S. ambassador's residence and Gemayel's presidential palace.

Reagan said the U.S. Navy would provide "naval gunfire and air support against any unit firing into greater Beirut from parts of Lebanon controlled by Syria." He said such attackers would "no longer have sanctuary from which to bombard Beirut at will."

Until now, U.S. gunships and warplanes generally hit only rebel units suspected of firing on the Marines at Beirut airport.

Beirut radio said the shelling of east Beirut came from artillery positions of anti-government Druse leftist forces in central mountain areas occupied by the Syrian army. The right-wing Christian "Voice of Lebanon" radio said two people were killed and 60 wounded.

The New Jersey's guns knocked out 30 Druse artillery batteries from Baissour, southeast of the airport, to Chitaura, on the Beirut-Damascus highway 22 miles east of the capital, the radio said.

The official Syrian news agency said "tens" of Lebanese, including women and children, were killed by Navy's "barbaric bombardment." The Druse radio said the Lebanese army also shelled the Druse village of Shweifat, near Beirut airport, killing 25 people.

Late last night, blasts from the New Jersey still shook this battered city. From the shore, flames could be seen flaring hundreds of feet from the gun barrels as they fired the half-ton shells into the hills. The shelling of east Beirut also went into the night.

The latest explosion in the civil war came last Thursday, and within four days Walid Jumblatt's Druse fighters and the militias of Nabih Berri's Shiite Moslem movement, Amal, took over west Beirut, driving the Lebanese army and Christian militias into east Lebanon.

Thousands of army troops, especially Moslems, had refused to fight. The 6th Brigade commander, Brig. Gen. Lutfi Jaber, declared Wednesday he was taking his unit to the Druse-Moslem side.

In west Beirut Wednesday, Shiite militiamen smashed up at least a half-dozen bars and stores selling liquor in an apparent effort to enforce the Islamic prohibition of alcohol.

But state radio later aired an Amal statement urging the militias to get off the streets and leave law enforcement to police. Berri said he would not tolerate "any behavior distorting our victory."

Under Reagan's announcement, 500 Marines will return to their ships over the next month, and the others will be pulled out in phases.

A Marine spokesman said orders with a withdrawal timetable had not arrived, but the Marines dug in at the airport were clearly excited.

"We heard last night. We drank our two beers for the day and had sweet dreams about going home," said Lance Cpl. Nick Motta of Orlando, Fla.

Regents call for volunteer disclosure of ID numbers

SUZANNE LARKIN
Staff Writer

K-State students will be asked to voluntarily disclose their Social Security numbers to the Kansas Department of Administration next semester to help the department enforce state unemployment benefit laws.

The Board of Regents approved a recommendation made by its Academic Affairs and Special Programs Committee making Social Security numbers from student's admission forms accessible to the department.

This new voluntary disclosure would assure compliance with state laws designed to stop any student from receiving unemployment benefits, said Gene Kasper, director of special programs for the regents.

"The chief reason for the voluntary disclosure of student Social Security numbers is to catch fraudulence, especially regarding unemployment benefits. Students cannot receive unemployment benefits if they are attending school," Kasper said.

Although emphasizing unemployment benefits, the voluntary action also could help locate outstanding state accounts, eliminate them and reduce governmental costs, he said.

The number of people caught taking advantage of federal programs will probably be small, Kasper said, but disclosure will be helpful in eliminating the misuse of state funds.

"If someone disobeys a law, we have the responsibility as regents to comply with the law and the state. The Division of Administration made a legal request, and we complied. We don't know how many people we may catch. More than likely it will be a small percentage, but it will help," he said.

A major concern about the disclosure is that it may violate students' privacy, said Ralph

Astronauts gear up for next walk; weather threatens shuttle landing

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Two Challenger astronauts refueled their backpacks Wednesday for an encore venture into open space, while officials on the ground worried that rain and clouds might prevent the first Florida shuttle landing on Saturday.

Mission Control told the crew "you're the talk of the world" after the spectacular excursion that Bruce McCandless and Robert Stewart made into space Tuesday with no rope to anchor them to the shuttle.

McCandless and Stewart were scheduled for a second walk beginning at 6 a.m. EST today, but their three fellow astronauts joked they might fight for the chance "to share all the good deals."

President Reagan will phone the astronauts at 10:25 a.m. today from his ranch near Santa Barbara, Calif., deputy White House press secretary Larry Speakes said. Speakes said McCandless and Stewart "will be outside their spacecraft" when they receive the call.

The five Americans weren't the only ones in space; the Soviets sent a Soyuz craft with three cosmonauts to its Salyut-7 space station.

The North American Aerospace Defense Command said the Soviets were separated from the shuttle by more than 575 miles. Once before a shuttle and a manned Soviet ship passed within 12 miles of each other, but the Americans did not see the cosmonauts.

Commander Vance Brand said the crew is "on top of the world."

"We certainly had a good time watching you all yesterday and you're the talk of the world this morning," replied mission control's Jerry Ross.

Pilot Robert Gibson, who is rarely heard to speak from space, told Ross, "We talked it over on board and we decided that in order to share all the good deals, Vance and I get to go outside tomorrow."

But Brand said the fifth crewman, Ronald McNair, "says he's going to fight all of us to go outside tomorrow."

Wednesday was a light day for the astronauts. McCandless and Stewart checked out the pressurized suits they wear outside the cabin and refilled them with supplies. Their Manned Maneuvering Units, in the cargo bay, were hooked to lines that filled them with the nitrogen gas that propels the astronauts in free flight.

The second space walk is a rehearsal for the next shuttle mission in April when two astronauts will bring in the malfunctioning Solar Max satellite for repair in the Challenger cargo bay.

Because Solar Max is spinning slowly, McCandless will try to hook a capture device onto a matching part being rotated slowly at the end of the shuttle's robot arm to see whether he can match the speed of the satellite; he will not use his gas jets today to stabilize the turning part as will the astronaut who does the real thing.

Weather officials reported a storm front is heading this way from the Gulf of Mexico, which could bring rain to this area at the planned 7:21 a.m. EST touchdown time Saturday.

NASA would like to start landing shuttles here instead of in California to save money and cut turnaround time between launches.

One previous attempt to land the shuttle here, last July, was scrubbed because of bad weather.

The lectureship has been funded by the gift of an endowment to provide for the costs of speakers' fees, travel expenses and honorariums.

Speakers selected for the lectureship will be recognized specialists in various aspects of veterinary medicine. The goal of the lectureship will be to provide information that will better equip students in the undergraduate and graduate programs in veterinary medicine and will include lectures on outstanding and pertinent topics of current interest.

Banquet to honor greek leaders

A leadership banquet is scheduled to highlight the many events of Greek Week Feb. 12-18.

Fraternity and sorority presidents, vice presidents and house mothers will attend the banquet, which is to begin at 6:30 p.m. Tuesday at Kennedy's Claim. Executive officers of the Panhellenic Council and the Interfraternity Council also will attend.

Guests at the banquet will include K-State President Duane Acker, University vice presidents and college deans. Pat Bosco, assistant vice president of student affairs, is scheduled to speak at the banquet.

Several scholarships and awards will be presented to house members that night. The Mary Francis White award for Panhellenic service will be presented, in addition to $1,000 worth of scholarships from the Panhellenic and Interfraternity Councils.

Library hours to be Senate topic tonight

A resolution supporting lengthening library hours will be considered by Student Senate tonight.

The resolution is designed to show student support for longer library hours, said Lori Leu, senate chairman.

"President Acker has been talking about extending the hours, and the Dean of Libraries (Brice Hobrock) has been talking about what can be done," she said. "We want to show that we're listening, that this is not just a campaign promise."

A bill which would change funding reviews for major line items from three to five years will receive first reading. The Union, Recreational Services and Student Publications would be affected by the bill.

"These groups come up for review every three years," Leu said. "It would be changed to five years, because it causes a lot of problems for them to prepare for such an extensive rundown. We look at them every year anyway, but not so in-depth."

Also receiving first reading is a bill which would allocate $75 to the Student Governing Association to cover the cost of mailing letters to the 250 winners of the Putnam Scholarship. The bill is designed to help student recruitment, Leu said.

Final action will be taken on a bill revising the SGA constitution and by-laws.

Course teaches music of Renaissance period

The music of the medieval age lives again through a K-State class called Collegium, in which students can learn to play the instruments of the days of Cavaliers and King Henry VIII's court.

Collegium is a word from the Renaissance which means a college music group.

"It (the class) started with people who wanted to learn Renaissance music," Sarah Funkhouser, Collegium instructor, said.

In this class the mingled alto, tenor and bass voices of a choir cut in and out rhythmically like an enchanting song of nature as they blend with the faint twangs of a harpsichord and the mellow alto whistling of recorders.

The class is comprised of students and faculty. "It's a town and gown organization. It's open to everyone," she said.

Those who join the class may opt to be either musicians or singers, and previous experience in music is not necessary, Funkhouser said.

The instruments used in the class include recorders, shawms, krum-phorns, zinks, lutes, dulcians, viola das gambas, sackbuts and the harpsichord. Most of these are woodwind instruments, except for the viola das gamba and the lute, which are string instruments, and the sackbut, which is a brass instrument. The harpsichord is a keyboard instrument.

Not only does the class perform on instruments popular during the Renaissance, but it also uses lyrics of the period and performs concerts.

The students are taught how to play music by such medieval composers as Jaquin des Paez, Monteverdi and Hinrich Isaac, and English Madrigalists such as Byrd, Danland, Morley and Henry Tudor.

The class has played for public schools, the Nelson Art Gallery and the Manhattan Music Club, Funkhouser said.

It also plays each year at the Renaissance Festival in Bonner Springs, she said, and has costumes to wear for those performances.

"We give one major concert a semester," she said. This semester the concert is scheduled for 3 p.m. May 6 at Farrell Library.

Billfold stolen from car

Between 7 p.m. and 11 p.m. Jan. 28, someone broke into a vehicle parked in the Skate Plaza parking lot, 400 Tuttle Creek Blvd. It appeared that the suspect first tried to pry open the driver's door of the 1977 Mercury Cougar, then went around the car and shattered the passenger side window. The suspect then opened the door and stole a billfold and cash from a purse.

The billfold was later found with the cash removed in a ditch near South Manhattan Avenue on Hunter's Island.

During the past several months there have been numerous car break-ins reported at Skate Plaza and other parking lots on the city's east side. Although the vehicles have been forcibly entered — usually on weekends during the same hours as this theft — only loose items such as purses and billfolds have been taken.

Anyone having information on this or any other crime is urged to call Crime Stoppers at 539-7777. Callers will remain anonymous and may qualify for cash rewards of up to $1,000.

ECKANKAR

Eckankar, as a way of life, focuses on the totality of the individual's life. Its teachings set forth principles for the purpose of individual spiritual unfoldment, allowing the individual to readress every aspect of his/her life—physical, emotional, mental, intuitive and the purely spiritual—in a new light. The individual chooses how to apply the principles he discovers through study of the ECK teachings to his own life, for personal unfoldment at his own pace.

The integrity of the individual and his right to make those decisions which influence his life is all important in Eckankar, and each is left completely free to make his own choices every step of the way. It is a violation of spiritual law to attempt to influence another's way of living or thinking in any way. Thus, Eckankar never seeks converts.

Nowhere in the ECK teachings is there denial of the validity of other perspectives. All are encouraged to continue with their present religious path or teaching if it provides them with the upliftment and answers they are seeking. Only when an individual has come to the end of his present course is he encouraged to investigate Eckankar.

Eckankar is not a cult, nor do its members follow special diets or communal lifestyles. Eckankar does not require worship of a personality or participation in rituals, does not deal with the doctrine of sin, nor does it ask for any tithing or put pressure on its members for financial support. Each member is encouraged to retain his individuality and meet his responsibilities to family, job and society.

Eckankar simply provides the techniques for an individual to prove to himself his own beingness as Soul and gain the personal experience of God and the heavenly words during this lifetime. The goals of Self and God-Realization become a reality.

Candidates miss issue of reward

The Association of Residence Halls is buying voters. Price: $50 to the residence hall with the largest voter turnout in the student elections. What a concept — indirectly bribe the student body to vote.

The candidates in Monday's debate over the $50 "incentive" missed the point. They were concerned that voter turnout from the residence halls would imbalance the election because of the monetary incentive. The greek and off-campus residents wouldn't have such an incentive to vote.

The point should be, out in the "real world," money can't buy you votes.

It is true that U.S. presidential candidates spend astronomical amounts of money on campaigns. It also is true that the U.S. government isn't giving tax breaks or cash rebates for votes. The League of Women Voters is not handing out dollars for votes. If we are going to play politics on campus, we should at least "play by the rules."

The result of such a payoff is students voting for candidates they know little about, let alone the stand the candidates take on the issues. What is worse — a small turnout at the campus polls of interested and knowledgeable voters or a mass turnout of uninformed voters?

Campus support for student government is pathetic. Students either are "too busy" or just don't care. The only time students, as a whole, respond to campus issues is after it is too late. They don't realize that many decisions affecting their college life are made by the individuals in student government.

But money is no excuse to woo the voters to the polls. It's an innovative idea, but unrealistic compared to the "real world." One can be assured that ARH was doing its best in trying to knock the student body off of dead center. But please, keep your money.

Marines not really out of Beirut

In order to save face, he didn't make the announcement in public, but President Reagan eased his stringent foreign policy Tuesday by ordering the relocation of Marines stationed in Beirut to warships off the coast of Lebanon.

Initially, this comes as somewhat of a shock. Reagan had maintained a belligerent attitude toward the troops there: he seemed determined that they should stay to "keep peace" as long as necessary.

But with the resignation of Lebanese President Amin Gemayel's cabinet and the subsequent warfare in the streets of Beirut, Reagan agreed to move the Marines to the safety of the naval fleet. This comes as somewhat of a relief.

But actually, the situation has not improved. True, the Marines are out of Beirut, but their strategic importance and attack capacity has not diminished. Reagan gave the warships permission to fire against any units shooting into Beirut from Syrian-controlled territory in Lebanon. The fleet was also granted license to defend against any direct attacks on the multinational force there — British, French and Italian forces as well as American.

But first appearances are deceiving. Reagan has not changed his attitude. Instead, he has made a deeper commitment to military involvement in the Middle East.

Another Jackson steals spotlight

WASHINGTON — Only one individual could have stolen the stage from Ronald Reagan last weekend. His name is Michael Jackson, and he did.

As some of the world waited anxiously for the president to declare his future plans, most of it contemplated the scalp burns suffered by Jackson during a Pepsi commercial taping. Before releasing Jackson to the greater privacy of his family's Encino (Calif.) home, Brotman Memorial Hospital had been deluged with 200 telephone calls a minute. The singer's condition seemed to warrant hourly updates.

Reagan-Bush '84 and Walter Mondale, eat your hearts out. The country's response to Jackson's accident demonstrated the almost unparalleled hold the 25-year-old entertainer now has over millions of red, white and blue American citizens. It is a cross-sectional allegiance that any politician would envy.

Admittedly, many of us who scoffed at Michael Jackson more than a dozen years ago are probably eating their back issues of Rolling Stone. At the beginning of the '70s, rock enthusiasts were following "progressive" FM radio stations for the latest trends. With some exceptions, Motown's Jackson brothers (of whom Michael was number five) were wholly identified with the more wholesome AM variety, teen magazines, animated films and the Ed Sullivan Show — not stuff for self-respecting rockers at the time.

But now many of yesterday's cynics are given to trading conversation for oscillation whenever a Michael Jackson number blasts the air. They and other young followers have helped make Jackson, whose recent "Thriller" album has sold 23 million copies, the highest-selling solo recording artist of all time. His name is of such prominence that when the Syrians told Lt. Robert Goodman that a "Mr. Jackson" would be paying him a visit, the Navy pilot was heard to ask not, "Who, Jesse?" but, "Who, Michael?"

Michael Jackson has eclipsed his bubble gum roots to become a pretender to Frank Sinatra's title as chief crooner to the American middle class. He's got everyone from Valley Girls to Republican activists ogling and wiggling. Many in the media seem to be acting similarly, focusing on Jackson's intensely private and sometimes peculiar ways with mythmaker's diligence.

Jackson's ascendancy is a function, in part, of the artist's vocal talent. No one since the Beatles has been able to place so many singles on the airwaves with so much wide-ranging approval.

But Jackson (undoubtedly with the help of his managers) has also proved adept with the modern instrument of rock: the video. Featured in the film version of "The Wiz," Jackson has become both star and producer in the world of Music Television, or MTV, where some of today's most popular bands (Men at Work, Culture Club) have made their splash. His video exploits have included a duet with Paul McCartney and, for distribution to movie theaters, a 14-minute, $1.1 million film based on the "Thriller" album.

As most who've seen "Beat It" or "Billie Jean," two of MTV's most popular videos, will agree, much of their appeal relies on Jackson's feet. With help from a Broadway choreographer, Jackson has stolen any claims John Travolta's character in "Saturday Night Fever" might have had to being this generation's Gene Kelly.

Yet both women and men keep talking about Jackson, the physical specimen, as well. "Neither white nor black, man nor woman," is how Paris Match recently described him. Jackson is often called "beautiful," yet a studious, if not natural, androgyny has helped him become a sex symbol.

It's generally the fate of alleged superstars, especially those whose rise has been as meteoric as Jackson's to burn out, lose their luster or both. A recent Rolling Stone cover photograph of several aging rockers graphically illustrate how age can have a destructive effect. The McCartneys and Mick Jagger are the exceptions.

But Michael Jackson may have discerned a formula for joining the latter group. When the road becomes too weathering, film will have already proved itself a sufficiently adequate vehicle for promoting and sustaining one's youthful image. Indeed, Jackson could become the benchmark upon which the music world's future success stories are measured.

Vandalism of display damages civil rights...

Editor,

Isn't it nice to know there are white folks in this country who still want to deny that black people are human beings and have also contributed greatly to the growth of this country?

February is national Black History Month. The display of black achievements placed on the outside of the glass display case in the Union was defaced by some sick individual(s) Monday. However, in the attempt to deny black achievements, the individual(s) not only brought attention to the fact that racism is alive and well in this country and on this campus, but also the fact that blacks have contributed and continue to contribute to the progress of this country. These facts, for the most part, have been "conveniently" left out of history books by white people for their own "convenience" and psychological comfort.

However, don't get the impression that because of these contributions, life is now cozy for black Americans, because this incident proves otherwise. America has come a long way, but has 10 times farther to go.

What I now ask is for all individuals, particularly white people, during the rest of Black History Month, to please take the short time to read the different black achievement displays scheduled this month.

Maybe you'll learn the "truth" about black Americans in particular, your culture in general and yourself in particular. A college degree doesn't mean the person who earned it is not ignorant.

...indicates juvenile beliefs

Editor,

We are writing in hopes that the person or persons responsible for the insulting remarks written on the black awareness exhibit, located in front of the Union stateroom, will read this. We cannot begin to express our outrage and disappointment toward your action, evidence of your ignorance and prejudice. Such juvenile and outdated attitudes for a person who is supposedly attending school to broaden and educate his mind is appalling and reflective of wasteful learning. Frankly, we find it surprising that such narrowness has gotten this far.

If it sounds as though we are overly sensitive, we are, because an attack (whether made seriously or jokingly) has been made on our heritage, of which we are very proud and protective.

We realize that your opinion is not unique. We've heard it all before. We aren't asking anything of you, except that you keep your mouth shut and your opinions to yourself. We also suggest that you stop wasting money on tuition. A closed mind such as yours cannot possibly have any use for quality education.

Praying alone Blacks face poor attitudes

Editor,

Re: Laurie Diehl's column, "A prayer for prayer in schools," in the Feb. 6 Collegian:

I would like to clarify a grave misunderstanding Diehl provoked with her quote of Matthew 6:5-6. Jesus' point was not to conceal prayer. His relationship with the Pharisees and Sadducees was one which realized they based their salvation on works — "going through the motions." He was saying it is pointless to pray in front of people or do any other religious "work," such as going to church, until you have a personal relationship with God through Christ.

By "going into the closet," he was illustrating the fact that God judges us by our relationship with him when no one is looking.

Editor,

February is Black History Month around the nation. I am enraged to see that in spite of progress made by blacks for civil rights and increased awareness of black culture, blacks are still faced with the poor attitudes of many white Americans.

A display in the Union acknowledging Black History Month was destroyed Monday by someone who scribbled derogatory racial comments. The remarks such as "nigger," "lazy blacks" and "white women desire black men," appear to me to reflect the ignorance and insecurities of the person who wrote them.

Whites as a people aren't as superior as some seem to think. All races have violent people, lazy people, even people who display blatant ignorance. The destruction of that display was a blatant display of one person's ignorance and obvious fear of exposing himself and of losing his women to black men. I resent his attitude and lack of respect for black people, and I hope his attitude isn't shared by too many students here at K-State.

Our goal should be to establish a better understanding of all mankind. We've got a long way to go.

Group gains notice at last

Editor,

I know very well I am not prejudiced, but there are times when prejudice enters my mind. Every time the Black Student Union goes before the Student Senate for allocations, we are asked what we have done to receive money. At last we can say we have done something to get attention. I am speaking in reference to the person or persons who felt we left out the most important part of Black Awareness Month in our display at the Union. To them I would like to say I'm glad your mother and father taught you how to write "nigger" without misspelling the word.

Many whites believe blacks have come a long way with affirmative action, welfare, permission to attend K-State and white roommates. Most of all, whites have let us have a black national holiday.

How long must blacks try to prove to white America that this is our home, and we are here to stay?

Vandals invoke black pride

Editor,

I am writing this letter in reference to the "injustices" that certain irresponsible individuals on this campus have done to the Black History Month display in the Union. Behavior of this sort, past and present, has hindered this nation from becoming a nation based on equality — equality that Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and his followers fought for and are still fighting for.

Blacks and other minorities continually have to battle the majority in the world because of past injustices. Attitudes and acts of the sort as displayed in the Union should make blacks reflect on the past and re-establish in their minds the hardships King and his followers suffered in order to help bring blacks to where they are today.

I personally thank the vandals for their display of crude writings in the Union because, as a black woman, it gives me increased motivation to excel in whatever I do. And while I am on my way to the top, I will let everyone know that I am black and damn proud of it!

Brands, images may influence gift purchase

By KIM STOLLE
Collegian Reporter

Brand names — portrayed with a label, tag or emblem — have a significant affect on consumers' self images. They are often a deciding factor in what most people buy, whether the purchase is a pair of jeans, a blouse or sport socks.

Currently, David Andrus, assistant professor of marketing, is conducting a study on the affect brands and the self-images associated with them have on gift purchases. With the incentive of past discoveries, Andrus has started a project in which he explores the gift buying behavior of individuals, particularly college students.

People are willing to pay $20 to $30 more for a specific brand name. Upon entering a clothing store, customers are bombarded with so many brand names that a purchase decision is often difficult. Jeans alone carry numerous brand names, while brand name shirts differ by any one of a menagerie of animals placed as an emblem by the left breast.

Why are people willing to pay a different price for a small logo placed on an item?

"It represents things like different social class identities and different self-concept identities. People like to express themselves and who they are through the products they buy," Andrus said.

"The products define who they are, what groups they belong to and what groups they avoid, and people are willing to pay different prices to show which groups they belong to," he said.

People tend to buy clothes and shop at stores with images similar to their own self-image. This comparison of products and self-image is referred to as the brand-image/self-image matching process. Product price, quality and characteristics tend to coordinate with people's self-identity, Andrus said.

College students also participate in this process.

"Think of greek students versus town students versus dorm students. There are definite fashion trends. Everyone is somewhat aware of it. People may not expressly acknowledge it, but you can recognize it," Andrus said.

There are two identity images for each person. One is the real self-image, how the person perceives himself. The other is the ideal self-image, how the individual wishes to present himself or how he wishes he could be.

Although deciding factors in gift shopping differ from those when shopping for oneself, the brand-image/self-image matching process also plays a role when shopping for others.

"What I'm interested in, and what hasn't been studied, is the brand-image/self-image matching process in gift decisions," Andrus said.

Andrus predicted his study will show a definite relationship between the buyer's perception of the individual and the buyer's choice of gifts. Variables will differ if the buyer is a man or woman and if the receiver is male or female.

Women tend to buy brighter colors, pastels, mauves and more fashionable products for their men. These items are usually unacceptable and disliked by the men, Andrus said.

When men's bikini underwear were first introduced to the retail market, it was women who purchased these items, not men. Men originally didn't like the style, Andrus said.

Women are buy shirts and clothing for men based more on how they'd like to see them ideally than on the men's real concept, Andrus said.

"Men have been traditionally socialized to ignore things like color, fashion and coordination. I think women are trying to change men, class them up a little bit," Andrus said.

Andrus predicts that when a woman buys a gift for another woman, the buyer will base her decision on the receiver's real characteristics.

This pattern follows in the male category, he said. When a man buys a gift for another man, the buyer will buy a gift more suited to the receiver's real self. But when the man buys a gift for a woman, he'll purchase an item based on the woman's ideal characteristics, what she wants to be or represent.

Consumers use the same matching process to associate different attitudes with stores. People attribute different connotations to stores and shop at stores that match their own self-images, Andrus said.

The popularity of brand names will not fade out because as one designer name label fades, another will come in to take its place.

What will be next? No one knows for sure, but people will continue to play the brand name game in America.

Parking problems plague homeowners

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

In August 1956, The Manhattan Mercury made a plea to local residents to provide housing for single men. University policy forced women to live on campus, and a rising enrollment resulted in a housing shortage for male students.

As a result of answering this need, many people adapted their homes to include basement or upstairs apartments. Stormy Kennedy, 1029 Bertrand St., said her parents were among those answering the call.

"They were actually being good citizens of Manhattan," Kennedy, junior in geography, said. "They were responding to a need. A great need."

But that was 1956. There still is a housing problem, but it has changed since the days when enrollment hovered near 6,000. Part of that problem has become severe enough for city officials to engage in a land-use study, pitting realtors, who maintain they're fulfilling the need for student housing, against homeowners, who are trying to avoid a worsening parking problem and maintain the aesthetic value of their neighborhoods.

George and Stormy Kennedy are two of those citizens trying to protect their neighborhood. Mrs. Kennedy grew up only a few blocks from the neighborhood in which she now lives. Dr. Kennedy is a veterinarian at the K-State College of Veterinary Medicine and an associate professor of veterinary diagnosis.

One problem the Kennedys said they have is congested parking near their home. They said finding parking space is especially difficult when they want to entertain or find a place to park at night after work.

"We'd like to be able to park there (near their home)," Dr. Kennedy said. "We'd like to have friends over, and for them to be able to park there."

Bertrand and 10th streets run past their house. On both streets, parking is allowed only on one side. The parking situation is already too congested, they said, from workers building apartments just north of their house.

Pine Haven, an apartment building across the street from the Kennedys, has three occupied units. Additional units have been leased for next semester. The 12-plex has 24 spaces in its parking lot.

The Kennedys said they are afraid that if four occupants live in each unit, 48 people are going to be battling for the already-limited parking spaces.

Two conflicting ordinances plague the city. One ordinance states that single-resident dwellings (such as units found in a 12-plex) must have two off-street parking spaces per unit. This ordinance is basically designed for married couples' housing. Another ordinance states that structures larger than two units must have an off-street parking space for each non-related person.

Eric Cattell, a member of the city planning staff, said that while the city undertakes its land-use study, developers are able to operate under the ordinance which requires only two spaces per unit, with the understanding that the number of occupants who may reside in a unit may be limited in the future.

Stanley Lowe, owner of Pine Haven, said the apartments are designed for four people, but he would rent them to whomever wants them.

Lowe said parking there is a problem but not a unique problem.

"That's the way it is with every other 12-plex in this town," Lowe said.

The Kennedys don't sympathize. "These 12 units are just too big for the area with two off-street parking units," Mrs. Kennedy said. "I mean, let's face it, if you had a 7 p.m. to 9

'Bubble Boy' leaves shell for tests

HOUSTON — David, the 12-year-old "Bubble Boy" who lacks immunity to disease, was removed for the first time from a germ-free isolation unit so doctors could investigate why he has recurring fever, diarrhea and vomiting, hospital authorities said Wednesday.

Dr. William Shearer, chief of allergy and immunology services at Texas Children's Hospital, said David is not in imminent danger, but had to be removed from his normal unit so tests could be performed.

"We are conducting tests to determine the cause of these symptoms," Shearer said. "Because these symptoms require close medical supervision, we could not effectively treat them while he was in his isolation unit."

"This is not considered a crisis since David is not in imminent danger," Shearer said. "He is in good condition and good spirits."

David is the world's oldest survivor of severe combined immune deficiency. He underwent a bone marrow transplant on Oct. 20 in an attempt to enable him to develop disease immunity. Results of those tests are pending, Shearer said.

Jailed mayor seeks re-election

MOSBY, Mo. — Franklin Barnes won't be attending any victory celebrations this spring if he wins another term as mayor of this tiny western Missouri town.

He'll still be in prison.

Barnes is serving a six-month sentence at the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners in Springfield for failing to report two outstanding loans on an application for a third loan. The first two loans totaling $226,000 were gambled away in Las Vegas, Nev., according to his attorney.

Despite his guilty plea and prison term, Barnes continues to conduct some city business and draw his $50-a-month salary. He expects to be released in mid-May, and city aldermen have placed his name on the April 3 ballot.

"We didn't have any problems with him," said Mayor Pro Tem Don Carmichael, who said he has Barnes' power of attorney. "His problems were all personal."

City Attorney Michael Flood, who defended Barnes, said he is unsure about the legal questions of a felon running for office while he is in jail.

Bob Ruple, who is running against Barnes for mayor of the town of about 330 just east of Kansas City, said, "There are going to be a lot of people who vote for him, but I don't know how he could run from down in Springfield. I know if he's elected, he won't be able to serve."

Spanish military salute greets Fahd

MADRID — King Fahd of Saudi Arabia was greeted with full military honors, including a 21-gun salute, when he arrived here Wednesday for a private luncheon with King Juan Carlos at his La Zarzuela Palace.

Fahd's younger son, Prince Abdulaziz, Spanish Premier Felipe Gonzalez and Foreign Minister Fernando Moran also attended the luncheon.

The Saudi monarch arrived in Madrid earlier in the day from Marbella, where he is spending a vacation in his palace in that area of Spain's Southern Costa del Sol.

Juan Carlos met Fahd on his arrival at Madrid's airport, where the visitor was rendered the military honors.

Proposal to regulate Wolf Creek costs

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A coalition of nearly 50 Republicans and Democrats introduced a "far-reaching" bill in the Kansas House on Wednesday to expand the powers of the state Corporation Commission to regulate expected rate increases because of the $2.67 billion Wolf Creek nuclear power plant.

In fact, one of the bill's sponsors said it would clearly grant authority to the KCC to exclude all Wolf Creek costs from rates charged to customers of the utilities building the plant near Burlington, in east-central Kansas.

"This gives very broad authority to the Corporation Commission so they can't come back and say their hands are tied," said Rep. Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington, one of the bill's sponsors.

"As the KCC unfolds the facts, this should provide them with every means to do what is right for the Kansas ratepayers, and the ratepayers are who we're concerned about. We're not concerned about stockholders or the people on Wall Street. They weren't the ones who elected us to the Legislature."

Miller said the measure is a product of discussions among rank-and-file lawmakers since the start of the 1984 legislative session. A total of 46 lawmakers sponsored the proposal — 25 Democrats and 21 Republicans.

In addition, Miller said the bill represents an alternative to recommendations by Kansas Gas and Electric Co., one of Wolf Creek's owners, that the Legislature mandate a five-year plan for phasing the plant's construction costs into rates.

KG&E officials met with a group of lawmakers Tuesday and said they want assurances from the Legislature to prevent the KCC from periodically reviewing any Wolf Creek phase-in. Utility officials said assurances are needed for investors and to improve KG&E's ability to obtain financing to help complete the plant. The plant is scheduled to begin operation in the spring of 1985.

House Speaker Mike Hayden, R-Atwood, said he was pleased the bill had "bipartisan support," but said it was too early to decide whether he will endorse the measure. He was not among its sponsors.

"I wouldn't have any prejudice against it," said Hayden. "It is far-reaching. I think it will be the basis for dialogue and discussion."

The bill would give the KCC the power to:

— Review the prudence of a utility in its decision to build, operate or acquire ownership in a power plant.

— Exclude any part of a power plant from rates if it was determined that it was unneeded and constituted "excess electric generating capacity." Any of the "excess capacity" costs could be deferred, phased-in or permanently excluded from rates.

— Start proceedings before a power plant begins operation to determine whether the plant's costs were reasonable and prudent.

— Determine before a plant began to operate whether any of its costs, including both construction costs and financing charges, will be excluded from rates or phased-in.

— Require any phase-in of plant costs to be over at least 10 years, but not more than 15 years.

— Exclude from rates any financing charges that are determined to be a "result of lack of prudence by a utility."

KG&E officials were unable to provide lawmakers Tuesday with the total amount of financing charges for Wolf Creek, but the plant owners incur about $18.5 million a month in financing "carrying costs." Construction charges are about $34 million a month.

Wolf Creek, which is about 92 percent complete, is a joint project of KG&E of Wichita, Kansas City Power and Light Co. and a group of 25 rural electric cooperatives, the Kansas Electric Power Cooperative Inc. Combined they serve about 450,000 customers across the state.

The Corporation Commission, which regulates utilities in the state, has estimated Wolf Creek will cause rates to increase 50 percent to 80 percent for customers of KG&E and KCP&L if it is placed into rates all at once.

In a prepared statement issued when the bill was introduced, the measure's sponsors said:

"This action was taken because it has become clear that Kansas ratepayers face increasing jeopardy as the plant nears completion and KG&E's financial condition deteriorates further. The bill gives priority to the interests of Kansas ratepayers by increasing the number and types of tools available to the Kansas Corporation Commission to deal with problems presented by the $2.67 billion plant."

"We have to be careful about violating the Federal Privacy Act. The forms will have to be voluntary, and they will have to state why the state wants the Social Security numbers," Perry said.

Chet Peters, vice president for student affairs, said, "We have to comply with the state, but the major concern is making sure that students' privacy is not invaded."

Students cannot be forced to reveal their Social Security numbers, said William Kauffman, general counsel for the regents.

"While students attending school for the first time will have the option to disclose their Social Security numbers, those students already in school also will have an option, but each school will determine how they will do this," Kauffman said.

"I was simply asked to draft part of the form where this voluntary disclosure would occur," Kauffman said.

The state has only the Social Security numbers of students on the University payroll, graduate students and students who have received state or regent scholarships, Perry said. The federal government does not disclose Social Security numbers to the state or other governmental agencies.

"I don't think this will have much effect on students. If there are cases where students are drawing unemployment compensation they are not entitled to, we might be able to weed out a case or two. It is a type of checks-and-balances system which is needed," Perry said.

Drinking

Rockefeller IV says his primary legislative goal for the year is to raise his state's legal drinking age of 19 for residents. Hearings on the proposal are to begin today in the state Legislature.

Gov. Richard Snelling of Vermont, which has kept the legal drinking age at 18 since 1971, opposes raising the age to 21. He says the solution to drunken driving among teen-agers is improved education and better enforcement of drunken driving laws.

Snelling says driving deaths have decreased in Vermont.

Although Congress is taking steps to set a nationwide minimum legal drinking age of 21, Moulden says, state laws are "much more likely to be enforced."

Several governors, as well as Jim Burnett, chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board, oppose any congressional threat to withhold federal highway money as a way of enforcing a uniform drinking age of 21 among the states.

White House spokesman Robin Gray said Reagan has taken no position on the commission's highway fund cutoff proposal.

But Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg, D-N.J., has introduced a bill that would use the cutoff threat to press states into enforcing a uniform drinking age of 21.

Noon dramas showcase student talent

By KIM STOLLE
Collegian Reporter

Once every other week, K-State students, faculty and staff file into the Purple Masque Theatre for a taste of noon-hour entertainment along with their peanut-butter and jelly sandwiches.

Since 1977, the Lunchbag Theatre has posed as a laboratory for students enrolled in Lew Shelton's upper-level acting and directing classes.

"Originally, we were having an acting workshop with students in a one-act play," Shelton, assistant professor of speech, said. "They seemed to get bored and tired with it, so we started Lunchbag Theatre to give students lab experience with public response — with a live audience."

In Shelton's Practice in Directing class, each student is responsible for selecting a play which he would like to direct, Shelton said. Selection of plays is limited to one-act plays with a small cast, preferably two or three actors. The gender roles of the play must agree with the students available, and the facilities must be provided.

Once the play is chosen, the cast list is filled by students enrolled in the Practice in Acting class, he said. Rehearsals begin four weeks before the production is presented. Each student is required to participate in two performances.

Shelton said the performances usually draw an audience of 60-75 students, faculty and staff.

"Everyone enjoys themselves," John Winningham, junior in theatre, said. "It's a relaxed atmosphere, there's food, a play and you don't have to dress up. What else could you ask for?"

"It provides a lot of different types of plays and playwrights we don't get to see around here," Shelton said.

The theatre also provides the theatre students with an opportunity to work with others on an equal basis.

"In Lunchbag, you get to work with different student-directors and actors," Winningham said. "You feel more able to speak up with the directors. Since we're both students and learning, there's not such a barrier between the actor and the director. The actor puts some of his own ideas in the script without changing what the directors want. You'll try different ways, but the director always has the final word."

Some people consider the productions as stepping-stones to McCain Auditorium productions, but this is not always true.

"The Masque is more challenging," Winningham said. "In the Masque you must be more flexible. The audience is closer and more aware of movement and staging. McCain is a big established production, but it's the content that matters, not the budget."

Lunchbag Theatre has scheduled 10 performances throughout the rest of the semester. The first play, "Stage Productions," by Israel Horowitz, is scheduled for 11:30 a.m. today.

Survey of freshmen shows contradictions

By The College Press Service

LOS ANGELES — This year's freshman class is a bundle of contradictions. It's for school busing, against the legalization of marijuana, slightly more liberal than last year's freshman class, and yet more concerned with making money, according to a recently released study about freshman attitudes by the University of California-Los Angeles.

"Probably one of the most significant findings of this year's survey was the concern students voiced about grading in high school being too easy," said Kenneth Green, associate director of the study, "The American Freshman."

The survey has been conducted annually since 1966 by the UCLA's Graduate School of Education. It is the largest survey of its kind.

Students' concern that their high school grading systems were too easy "shows that the national concern over academic quality is not limited to educators and policy experts," Green said.

More than 58 percent of the 254,000 students surveyed at more than 480 colleges indicated that they felt their high school grades were inflated, compared to 54.5 percent last year.

At the same time, students' high school grades declined for the third year in a row. Only 20.4 percent of the students earned "A" averages in high school, compared to 20.8 percent last year and 23.3 percent in the peak year of 1978.

This year's freshmen also are more supportive of busing to integrate schools. For the first time in the history of the survey, more than half the students are pro-busing.

Only 36.9 percent of the students support increased military spending, compared to 38.9 percent last year.

More students are for a national health care system and greater government efforts to protect the environment.

Nearly half the freshman class of 1970 said married women "belong in the home." Only 24.5 percent of this year's entering class maintains the same attitude toward women, the study shows.

Overall, more students — 21.1 percent, compared to 20.7 percent last year — label themselves as "liberal" or "far left" in their political attitudes, while the students labeling themselves as "far right" or "conservative" dropped from 19.4 percent to 18.7 percent.

"Middle of the road" continues to be the most popular label, endorsed by 60.3 percent of the incoming students.

"But we're finding that more than ever, the traditional labels of liberal, conservative and middle of the road are not necessarily predictive of student attitudes on certain issues," Green said.

For instance, fewer students support the legalization of marijuana, greater government vigilance in protecting consumers, or more government-run energy conservation programs.

More students than ever are interested in making money and "being well off financially," the survey shows.

The number of students concerned with "developing a meaningful philosophy of life" hit an all-time low of 44 percent, down from 46.7 percent last year and 83 percent in 1967.

Business continues to be the most popular major, although the number of students interested in an engineering degree dropped for the first time in several years, from 12 to 10.8 percent.

The number of students interested in teaching rose for the first time in 15 years, from last year's all-time low of 4.7 to slightly over 5 percent.

"The trends in our data are reflections of the national economy," Green said. "The days of the college degree by itself bringing an assured future are gone, and we are seeing that reflected in students' choice of majors and career goals."

Senate to review multibank proposal

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Senate Commercial and Financial Institutions Committee introduced Wednesday a bill drafted by Senate President Ross Doyen and a bankers' lobbyist which would legalize multibank holding companies in Kansas for the first time.

The committee chairman scheduled hearings on the bill Monday and Tuesday.

It drew immediate criticism from an opposing lobbying group, whose chief spokesman labeled it a smokescreen to try to get Kansas bankers to accept something a majority of them strongly opposes.

Under current state law, a corporation can own controlling interest in only one bank and no more than 25 percent of any other banks.

The bill would allow corporations to own any number of banks, but the sales would require approval of the state bank commissioner and buyers would have to satisfy financial requirements as well as put local citizens on the boards of directors of the purchased banks.

Doyen and Patrick Hurley, former state secretary of administration who now is chief lobbyist for the group of banks promoting multibank holding companies, said the bill, if enacted, would give Kansas the strongest state banking law in the United States.

They said it has guarantees built into it which would insure strong local involvement in banking and protections against outsiders siphoning off local banking assets.

It would require that a majority of the members of the boards of directors of banks acquired by other banks be members of the local area, and that no big bank could acquire more than 11 percent of the total banking assets of the state.

It would give the state bank commissioner authority to approve all bank acquisitions after examining how the purchasing bank planned to protect local credit needs, and would prohibit any big banks from starting new banks. Only acquisitions of existing banks would be allowed.

Doyen, who worked with Hurley in drafting the legislation, said while he supports the bill and thinks it is time to change Kansas' banking laws he will not "twist any arms" to get the bill out of the Senate committee, which Hurley conceded has been less than enthusiastic about a multibank bill.

"I think the time has come we should have some debate and discussion on this issue," Doyen told the committee. "I feel there is a lot of interest out there, on both sides of this issue."

"The bill puts in a lot of protections. There are more safeguards in this bill than we have now. All I'm asking is we get this bill out of here so we can have discussions on the measure."

There were no dissenting votes as the committee decided by voice vote to introduce the bill.

Sen. Neil Arasmith, R-Phillipsburg, committee chairman, scheduled hearings for Monday and Tuesday.

The bill didn't impress its No. 1 opponent, former House Speaker Pete McGill, now chief lobbyist for the Kansas Independent Bankers Association.

Calling the measure a "sham" and a "subterfuge," McGill said it is "just a watered-down version of other bills they've proposed."

"Kansas Independent Bankers is just as opposed to this bill as it has been to the others," McGill said. "It is the same approach that's been used in other states to get the camel's nose under the tent."

Hurley, chief lobbyist for Kansas Association for Economic Growth, said the bill was not introduced until the fifth week of the 1984 session — although it was expected to be one of the hottest issues of the session — because of the time required to draft a bill aimed at satisfying all the arguments against multibank holding companies.

The bill has three main sections, Hurley said. They would:

— Legalize multibank holding companies in the state, repealing the state's century-old unit banking law.

— Place numerous requirements on corporations purchasing banks, requiring them to make application and show fiscal responsibility, and insuring protection of local investors and borrowers.

— Incorporate provisions of the federal Commercial Credit Protection Act into state law, requiring the purchasing corporation to submit to the bank commissioner a statement identifying the credit needs of the community in which the bank being purchased is located.

Wildcats declaw MU's Thomas in 67-46 win

By HUEY COUNTS
Sports Editor

In a basketball game that is certain to turn the heads of the rest of the members of the Big Eight Conference, the K-State Wildcats traveled to Columbia and shocked the University of Missouri faithful as they handed the Tigers a 67-46 setback.

K-State Head Coach Jack Hartman made a lineup change for the Wednesday night contest, inserting Tom Alfaro into a guard position and sitting Jim Roder — who had started the team's previous 19 games this season — on the bench.

Early in the second half, the Wildcats began opening up what had up to that point been a tight, see-saw battle.

Forward Lafayette Watkins gave a clue as to what was in store in the second half, as he blocked Malcolm Thomas' first shot into the stands. Following a Missouri miss, Eddie Elder hit an 18-foot jumper from the top of the key that put K-State on top, 28-22.

Following a Missouri score, Watkins and Alfaro nailed down baskets as the Wildcats opened up a 32-24 lead.

With the score 36-30 in their favor, the Wildcats began to control the game. Forward Tyrone Jackson, just off the bench, tossed in a short jumper to give the 'Cats an eight-point lead. After a Tigers' basket cut the lead to six, the Wildcats scored eight consecutive points to move ahead of Missouri, 44-32.

At this point, Missouri Head Coach Norm Stewart put five new players into the lineup.

Jim Roder made two free throws which put the Wildcats on top, 46-32. Missouri answered on a basket by forward Blake Wortham, after having gone over eight minutes without a score.

Two more free throws by Roder and two points by Alfaro pushed the K-State lead to 52-36.

Billy Roundtree, a Tigers guard, hit the front end of a one-and-one situation making the score 56-39. Roder put in five straight points for the Wildcats as their lead ballooned to 61-41.

Guard Eric Watson scored his only basket as time expired, giving K-State its biggest margin of victory since an 83-62 win over U.S. International on Dec. 3.

None of the Missouri players were able to break into double figures in scoring. Jones led the Tigers with nine points and Bridges added eight. Thomas, who had scored 79 points total in his three previous outings, was held to seven.

Alfaro led the Wildcats in scoring with 14 points as he made all six of his tries from the charity line. He has not missed a free throw in 14 tries from the stripe.

Roder, who was nine of 10 from the line, scored 13 in his first game off the bench. Elder chipped in 12, and Watkins added 11, playing a good game on both ends of the court.

The victory, K-State's first on the road this season, improves the 'Cats conference record to 2-5 and their overall record evens out to 10-10. Meanwhile, Missouri falls to 3-4 in Big Eight play and 14-8 overall.

The Wildcats travel to Norman Saturday to face the Oklahoma Sooners. Game time has been switched from 4 p.m. to 7:05 p.m. The Sooners edged the Wildcats in their last meeting at Ahearn Field House, 83-80.

Spring training?

With just over three weeks to go until the first game, Wildcats baseball Head Coach Bill Hickey leads his squad through one of the season's first outdoor practices. Hickey, who is completing his first full year as head coach, is looking forward to building a solid baseball program at K-State.

Lady 'Cats upset by Missouri Watson prepares for tournament, hopes practice will reverse slump

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

A 20-6 scoring burst in the first half enabled the 12th-ranked University of Missouri Lady Tigers to hold on for a 66-42 upset over the 10th-ranked K-State Lady 'Cats last night in Columbia.

Missouri takes over sole possession of first place in the Big Eight, improving to 17-3 overall and 6-1 in the conference. K-State falls to 15-5 overall and 5-2 in the Big Eight race.

Missouri guards got the Lady Tigers rolling in the first minutes of play, accounting for all of MU's early 10-4 lead. Sophomore Sarah Campbell and senior Dee Dee Polk canned eight of those 10 points.

The Lady Tigers scored 10 more points, while K-State managed only two in the next six minutes of play. Senior center Angie Bonner finally got the Lady 'Cats untracked, connecting on a three-point play to pull K-State within 11 points.

The Lady 'Cats fought back before the first half's close, outscoring MU 18-11 to pull within four, 31-27, at halftime.

Sophomore Cassandra Jones scored four and Jennifer Jones added a basket during the second half's opening minutes as K-State tied the score for the first time at 33-all. K-State could never gain the lead, however, as Missouri built back a 11-point advantage with about five minutes remaining in the contest.

The Lady 'Cats made their last comeback try, closing to 60-56 with about two minutes to play. Bonner scored the next six K-State points, but could not cut the MU lead as the Lady Tigers held on for the 66-42 victory.

Turnovers played a big role in the game for both squads, with K-State leading the way with 28. The Lady Tigers committed 23.

Cassandra Jones and Jennifer Jones lead K-State in scoring, each netting 14 points. Bonner added 12 to the Lady 'Cats offensive attack that had much difficulty in the first half, Head Coach Lynn Hickey said.

"We started off real slow offensively," Hickey said. K-State's offensive output provided only nine points in the game's first 11 minutes of play. "We looked scared out there," she said.

It was a game of low percentages for the Lady 'Cats, as they connected on 23 of 64 field goals for 36 percent and made only 26 of 58 free throws for a season-low 44.8 percent. K-State's previous free throw low was a 46.2 showing against the University of Texas.

"We ended up fighting back," said Hickey of K-State's first-half sluggishness. "But Missouri is such a fine team that you can't wait until the end to do it."

Campbell and Polk lead the Lady Tigers offensively, scoring 17 and 16 points respectively.

K-State next faces the University of Oklahoma in a Saturday contest at Norman. The Lady 'Cats defeated OU 88-70 in their first encounter this season.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Oklahoma and Oklahoma State landed the top running backs in Oklahoma and Texas, respectively, on football letter-of-intent day Wednesday. Nebraska — possibly hampered by Mike Rozier's remarks last week — saw many of their top recruits slip away.

Nebraska Coach Tom Osborne broke with tradition Wednesday and called off a news conference to discuss the signings. Osborne said earlier that rumors of a pending NCAA probe had been "devastating" to the 'Huskers' recruiting.

The top running backs coming into the Big Eight Conference next fall apparently will belong to Oklahoma and Oklahoma State. The Sooners, who also struggled with rumors when some people thought Marcus Dupree was returning from Southern Mississippi, signed up Enid, Okla., runner Lydell Carr.

Oklahoma State's top prize, Thurman Thomas of Fort Bend, Texas, was considered the No. 1 running back in the Lone Star State.

By The Associated Press

HONOLULU — There is, Tom Watson said, one solution for his current problems. "Play better," he said during a lengthy, intense practice session for the $500,000 Hawaiian Open Golf Tournament that begins today on the 6,881 yard, par 72 Waialae Country Club course.

"It just takes some hard work," said Watson, who — for the first time since 1978 — has missed the cut in two consecutive tournaments. After winning the Seiko-Tucson Match Play event that kicked off the 1984 campaign, he failed to qualify for the closing rounds in his last two events — the San Diego Open and the Bing Crosby National Pro-Am.

"I'm just not playing well at all. Nothing in particular you can put your finger on. I'm just not doing anything very well," he said.

He dumped a bucket of balls into a practice bunker and worked on sand shots while a whispering gallery gathered. He worked for 20 minutes on little chips around the green, then went to the practice tee, pounding long irons toward a line of distant palm trees.

"Maybe the long layoff (during the winter) has something to do with it. Maybe. I'm not hitting the ball well at all. And when I get a putt I have to make, I miss it," said Watson, a five-time British Open champion.

Watson, who won only the British Open last year, said earlier this season he was determined to become a multiple winner again in 1984. He admitted he was disappointed with his last two performances.

Other major contenders include 1984 title-winners John Mahaffey, Tom Purtzer, Gary Koch and Hale Irwin, a playoff winner last week in the Crosby, along with defending champion Isao Aoki of Japan and U.S. Open champion Larry Nelson.

Portions of the final two rounds Saturday and Sunday will be televised nationally by NBC.

Klammer recalls 1976 glory

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — The roar of 60,000 voices is still in the ears of Franz Klammer. He remembers the adulation of more than 7 million Austrians.

It was his moment of glory, a stunning victory in the men's downhill at the 1976 Winter Olympics at Innsbruck, Austria, Klammer's home country.

Klammer is back at the XIV Olympic Winter Games, after missing the 1980 Games at Lake Placid, N.Y., because he was in a slump. This time, he was honored by his teammates and picked to carry the Austrian flag in Wednesday's opening ceremonies.

He has staged a remarkable comeback this season, winning one race and finishing high in two others. But on the slopes of Mount Bjelasnica, where the downhill gold medal will be contested today, his best training run was only 11th fastest of the day. He has complained that the relatively flat course is a hill "for 8-year-olds."

No matter. Klammer's place in skiing history was assured with that gold-medal run in Innsbruck.

"How can I forget the victory eight years ago?" he said. "This was no everyday affair. This was something you will always remember."

"It was my biggest success. The downhill there was difficult, because the race was in my home country. I probably have not done better anywhere before or since then."

Klammer's career record shows 25 World Cup downhill victories, plus the Olympic gold and a runner-up finish in the world championship downhill in St. Moritz, Switzerland, in 1974.

His Olympic victory came on a sunny day on Mount Patcherkofel, which overlooks Innsbruck, the capital of Tyrol.

K-State concentrates on in-state prepsters

K-State concentrated on Kansas high school players Wednesday, with 15 Kansans among the 18 players signed to national football letters of intent.

"As always, we concentrated on Kansas players, and we have some we feel are very talented," said Wildcats Head Coach Jim Dickey. "We're a little bit stronger at defensive back, since they have a little more speed than we had last year."

Three running backs from Kansas high schools were among the signees: Jay Wade, 6-foot-2 and 185 pounds, from Haviland, who rushed for 1,300 yards last season; Andy Schrag, 5-foot-11, 175 pounds, from Kingman, who rushed for a career 2,428 yards; and Lawrence Tolbert, 6-foot-2, 195 pounds, of Garden City, who compiled 786 yards rushing last season.

Brad Miller, a 6-foot-6, 190-pound tight end from Riley was one of four Manhattan-area recruits announced by K-State. The others, from Manhattan High School, are defensive end Jeff Daily, 6-foot-2, 195 pounds, defensive tackle Rob Goode, 6-foot-1, 214 pounds and linebacker Matt Wallerstedt, 5-foot-11, 198 pounds.

Other signees include 6-foot-2, 180-pound wide receiver Larry Keys of Kansas City, Kan., Schlagle, who caught 61 passes for 1,037 yards in two seasons; offensive-defensive tackle Kevin Bruce, 6-foot-5, 245 pounds, Galva; defensive back Rex Ramaga, 6-foot-1, 195 pounds, Little River; offensive-defensive tackle Randy Call, 6-foot-5, 240 pounds, Iola; defensive back Robert Easterwood, 6-foot-2, 175 pounds, Kansas City, Kan.,

Washington; offensive-defensive tackle Jim Oehm, 6-foot-3, 225 pounds, Marysville; and offensive guard Brian Curry, 6-foot-3, 225 pounds, Dallas-Skyline High, who played at Rockhurst High School in Kansas City, Mo.

Dickey also announced the signings of two Texans, defensive back Tim Griffin, 6-foot-1, 180 pounds, Dallas-Skyline High, and defensive back Kenneth Anderson, 6-foot, 175 pounds, Rowlett.

Steve Gavin, a 6-foot-2, 220-pound linebacker, from Richmond, Va., who played at Arizona Western Junior College, also signed with K-State.

Running back John Kendrick of Butler County Community College also signed, and Dickey said he expected the former Topeka High School player to "make an immediate contribution" to the Wildcats.

Kendrick was second in the nation among junior college players last year in rushing and scoring, with 1,720 yards and 22 touchdowns. He was an honorable mention on the All-America team and a member of the All-Jayhawk Jucos team.

With the signing of Gavin and Kendrick, the Wildcats have now signed 10 junior college athletes to letters of intent. Dickey announced eight other junior college transfers earlier in the year.

"We're definitely going to continue our redshirt program," Dickey said. "If we try to exist on a four-year basis, we've got no chance."

Of the 18 announced recruits, six are projected as defensive backs, seven as linemen, one as a wide receiver, two as running backs and two as linebackers.

U.S. team popular at Games' opening

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — The loose-swinging Yankees, waving their wide-brimmed cowboy hats, beat their rival Soviets on the decibel scale in the athletes' parade Wednesday at opening ceremonies of the Winter Olympics.

The host Yugoslavs, although independent Communists, went wild over the Americans, while giving the huge, impressively attired Soviet delegation only polite applause.

On a scale of one to 10, you'd have to give the American ovation an eight, just back of the more-than 100 Yugoslavs, as hosts bringing up the rear of the 49-nation march around the red oval track of Koseva Stadium.

Neat in their long gray coats and azure blue hats and boots, they naturally drew the loudest ovation. Spectators stood and applauded as they toured the track.

For days now, the Americans, in their red, white and blue leisure wear, have been courting the friendly Yugoslavs by handing out pins and mementos and talking to them about life at home.

The Soviets, late arrivals, have not been as visible on the city's streets, in restaurants and around the various venues.

Numbering about 75, they made an imposing impression in the parade, attired in lush suede coats with fur-trimmed collars and cuffs and colorful scarves.

The Americans looked like a page out of the Old West in their blue jeans, fur-trimmed suede jackets, wide brimmed hats and boots.

They waved their hats wildly as they passed the reviewing stand, and the crowd let out a big roar.

To accompany their march, organizers played "The Yellow Rose of Texas." But a miscalculation put that tune on the sound system as the Italian team arrived.

It appeared that there were more Americans in the crowd than Soviets, with small flags popping up at various sections of the stands. The Russians seemed concentrated in one section, with one spectator hoisting a huge red banner with the hammer-and-sickle emblem in the corner.

The various countries offered a variety in styles of dress. The large Canadian delegation was impressive in red jackets with white fur trim. The Poles were equally striking in beige uniforms with red stocking caps.

Chileans wore black hats and white sneakers. The Japanese raised white gloves carrying the red insignia of the Land of the Rising Sun. The Moroccans, in white turbans and black cloaks reaching to their ankles, looked like something out of the Arabian Nights.

But the Yugoslavs seemed to like the cowboys best. They remember Roy Rogers and John Wayne on their TV screens.

Remember growing up and trying to decide which athletes' posters and pictures to hang up on your bedroom walls?

I used to drive my mother crazy by constantly rearranging my numerous photographs, posters and pennants — leaving tack holes all over the walls.

She was constantly asking me, "Can't you just leave them in one place and quit switching them around?" I was appalled that my mother couldn't understand the normal, seasonal rotation of my wall hangings.

"Gosh mom, it's football season. I can't leave Johnny (Bench) up forever," I'd tell her.

I went through numerous phases in my poster hanging years. First, there was the "all-one-sport" phase, where I'd pick my favorite sport — baseball — and cover my walls with every baseball picture I could find.

When I got a few years older, I switched to the "all-sports" phase that involved hanging up pictures of every athletic figure under the sun so that all the different sports seasons would be covered and I wouldn't have to change each season. Mom was partially satisfied with that phase.

I — as I'm sure many, many other kids did — grew up looking up to athletes as idols. I always wanted to be able to hit a baseball like Pete Rose, shoot a basketball like Oscar Robertson and throw a football as well as Sonny Jurgenson.

Do these athletes have any responsibilities to their fans — the children who spent their allowances on bubble gum cards hoping to get a picture of George Brett or Julius Erving? Do they owe their salaries to the people who buy tickets to watch them play? Do they have a responsibility to those of us who buy that poster that hangs in our room and enshrines our favorite sports figure as our "main man?"

You're damn right they do. When I read that Willie Wilson wanted an early release from his three-month prison term because he had come to terms with the pressure of his incarceration, I laughed out loud.

Come on Willie, join the real world. You did wrong, got caught and have to pay the price.

Willie is the one who said he only had to be a role model for his own kids, not the ones who worship the astro-turf he walked on. Actually I'm glad you said that Willie, because I wouldn't want anyone else's kids to idolize a person who did the things you did. I just feel sorry for your own children. You're lucky that you're only serving a measly three-month sentence.

I know professional athletes work hard to get where they are, and they may feel that they don't owe anybody anything. But along with success comes responsibility. It's that way in any profession. In business they call it "tarnishing the company's image."

It's a shame that a handful of athletes can have such a negative effect on the way people these days look at athletes. In sports, it's not easy to forgive and forget. Willie is going to learn that.

Atkinson sparks Cowboys past Kansas

By The Associated Press

Joe Atkinson scored 24 points and Charles Williams added 17 Wednesday night as Oklahoma State beat Kansas, 71-61, and dealt a crushing blow to the Jayhawks' title hopes in the Big Eight Conference.

The Cowboys scored eight straight points in a two-minute stretch of the second half for a 46-42 lead, and padded it down the stretch to improve to 12-8 overall and 4-3 in the conference.

Kansas, a pre-season favorite to win the league title, fell to 13-7 and 4-3, putting the Jayhawks in the middle of the pack in the conference race. Calvin Thompson led them with 17 points, while Carl Henry added 13 and Kelly Knight 12.

The Cowboys had taken a 33-28 halftime lead, but the Jayhawks reeled off the first eight points of the second period for a 36-33 advantage. Greg Dreiling, Kansas' 7-1 center, scored five of the points with his powerful inside play.

With Kansas nursing a 42-38 lead, Atkinson brought the Gallagher Hall crowd to life with a slam dunk on a tip-in, and Oklahoma State's Bill Self tied the game at 42 when he stole a pass and raced the length of the court for a layup.

Oklahoma's Wayman Tisdale scored 33 points including 25 in the second half to lift the No. 10-ranked Sooners past Nebraska 78-67 in Lincoln.

He scored eight of his team's first 10 points in the second half as the Sooners built a 41-34 lead with about 17:30 to go. After that, Nebraska was never able to get closer than four points, 43-39, with about 15:30 left in the game.

Oklahoma, 19-3 overall and 6-1 in the conference, led by as many as 15 points, 65-50, with about 7:30 to go in the game.

The game was close throughout the first half, with the lead changing hands seven times and the score tied on four occasions.

Dave Hoppen led Nebraska's scoring with a career-matching best of 27 points. Stan Cloudy added 16 points for Nebraska while Eric Williams had 10.

For Oklahoma, Calvin Pierce had 14 points and David Johnson added 13.

Nebraska is now 3-4 in conference play and 13-7 overall.

U.S. fleet continues to blast rebels in Beirut

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — The U.S. 6th Fleet bombarded the rebel-held ridges outside Beirut for a second day Thursday, after government and rebel gunners traded deadly artillery barrages around the divided and devastated city.

Lebanese and Syrian reports claimed U.S. Navy jets also went into action over the mountain area Thursday, but a U.S. military spokesman denied it.

Syria, whose troops occupy the mountains with the Druse-Moslem anti-government forces, issued an ominous warning to the United States.

"Syria cannot stand neutral watching the barbaric bombardment practiced by the 6th Fleet against Lebanese civilians," the Damascus government radio said. It said the Syrians "may be compelled to react."

The U.S. Embassy here said, meanwhile, it was not yet considering a general evacuation of the estimated 1,500 U.S. citizens in Beirut. About 50 more U.S. Embassy employees and dependents were airlifted out by helicopter Thursday to 6th Fleet ships offshore, U.S. Marine spokesman Maj. Dennis Brooks reported. That brought to about 140 the number of American civilians pulled out thus far, for transfer to the safety of Cyprus.

Lebanon's embattled Christian president, U.S.-supported Amin Gemayel, remained out of sight Thursday. Gemayel, whose Moslem-Christian Cabinet resigned last weekend, is trying to patch together a new "national coalition" government. But his Syrian-backed Lebanese enemies demand that he resign.

The president's position suffered a major blow early this week when Shiite Moslem and Druse militiamen took control of west Beirut, driving out army troops and Christian militiamen. Thousands of army soldiers have defected to the anti-Gemayel side.

Along the "Green Line" separating Moslem west from Christian east Beirut, sporadic small arms and shell fire was heard Thursday. Local radio reports said army troops also clashed with militiamen in the port area and the Shiite-populated southern suburbs.

Later Thursday, as night fell, Christian neighborhoods in east Beirut came under sustained bombardment, apparently from artillerymen in Syrian-occupied Druse areas.

Artillery of the Lebanese army and Christian militia, meanwhile, pounded population centers in the Druse-controlled hills southeast of the city and in the Shiite suburbs, the Druse-controlled radio said. The Christian militia is an arm of the right-wing Phalange Party, headed by the president's father, Pierre Gemayel.

The 6th Fleet destroyer Moosbrugger, in response to the shelling of east Beirut, opened up with its five-inch guns, U.S. spokesman Brooks said. "It fired on artillery positions in the mountains east of Beirut, approximately 150 rounds," he said.

President Reagan, in a policy statement Tuesday announcing that the 1,400 U.S. Marines in Beirut would be withdrawn in the coming weeks, also said 6th Fleet ships would retaliate against anyone firing on Beirut "from parts of Lebanon controlled by Syria."

It was a forceful show of support for Gemayel. On Wednesday, the battleship New Jersey and destroyer Caron hammered military targets in Syrian-controlled areas in a half-day-long barrage, more than 550 shells, Lebanese government sources said both Druse and Syrian military positions were destroyed.

But on Thursday, as uneasiness mounted in U.S. Congress over the expanded American role in the Lebanese conflict, White House spokesman Larry Speakes restated the U.S. policy on use of the 6th Fleet guns.

He said the Reagan administration had worked out an agreement with Congress authorizing shelling only to protect U.S. servicemen and other troops in the four-nation peacekeeping force here.

There were no reports Thursday that the 1,400 U.S. Marines dug in at the airport on Beirut's southern edge had come under renewed fire. But Speakes told Washington reporters that any firing into Beirut endangers the U.S. troops.

The Lebanese state radio said warplanes also struck long-range artillery batteries and rocket launchers Thursday in the mountains at Tarshish, 20 miles northeast of Beirut.

The Phalangist radio said the planes were U.S. Navy jets, and a Syrian military spokesman in Damascus said U.S. F-14 jets had "interfered" in the area and were driven off by Syrian air defense crews.

Presidential run-off rules set for Feb. 15 election

Voting for the student body presidential run-off election is scheduled for Feb. 15 in the Union.

Votes can be cast for the run-off between Ken Heinz, junior in computer science, and Tracy Turner, junior in economics, from 7:30 a.m. to 8:30 p.m. on the main floor of the Union.

The candidates' expenditures for the run-off election are not allowed to exceed $205. The expenditure limit for presidential candidates preceding the initial elections was $820, said Lynn Pennington, publicity chairman for the Election Committee and senior in fashion marketing.

The additional $205 allows each candidate to purchase advertising, hang signs and process buttons for another week of campaigning, she said.

Robot failure disappoints spacewalkers

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Bundled in their bulky suits, Challenger's exuberant spacewalkers performed an impromptu rescue Thursday, snatching back a piece of equipment as it drifted toward the junkyard of space.

They flew free and joyously, propelled by bursts of nitrogen gas from their backpacks. But the day was not without its disappointment — the latest in a long series for this shuttle crew. The "wrist" on the shuttle's robot arm refused to respond to commands, canceling a docking rehearsal with a rotating object.

"The view is simply spectacular and panoramic," astronaut Bruce McCandless told President Reagan when he made his customary once-a-mission call to the shuttle. McCandless was showing restraint with his commander-in-chief. Earlier he had exulted: "Up, up in the bay." His partner, Robert Stewart, said, "Boy, it's awful pretty."

Astronauts make impromptu rescue

Earlier pessimism that bad weather would again delay or cancel a first landing Saturday at Florida's Kennedy Space Center turned to optimism as an expected weather front stalled over Texas.

"Right now it's looking real good for KSC," the astronauts were told.

From mission control came applause when McCandless reached over the side of the spaceship and, like a child pulling at a balloon, retrieved a foot restraint that had broken loose and was floating away. He was on his safety line at the time.

He had help from commander Vance Brand, who gently pulsed Challenger's small steering rockets to move 30 feet closer to the restraint — "just as he would do if he had to rescue a stranded astronaut in a maneuvering unit," mission control said.

McCandless clearly enjoyed the freedom of moving about in his flying machine. One memorable view was of him, feet toward the Earth above, head down to the shuttle cargo bay, suspended in space.

Commenting that it was easier the second time around, McCandless and Stewart quickly settled down to the real business of the day: testing techniques for grappling, repairing and refueling crippled satellites.

Such an attempt will be made in April.

The cancellation of the hookup with a large box rotating very slowly on the end of the robot arm was a disappointment, because it had been a major goal of the space walk. The astronauts substituted a metal pin on a work station box and repeatedly practiced floating toward the box and clamping a tube-like device on their jet-packs onto a docking pin.

The exercise went without a flaw. Earlier in the mission, two satellites deployed from the shuttle failed to reach proper orbit, and a balloon launched for a rendezvous maneuver blew up.

The spacewalk, 6 hours 17 minutes, was the last of the flight. The major tasks still facing the five-man crew is a space-to-ground press conference early this morning and the landing.

Officials debate timing of Marines' evacuation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Administration officials Thursday offered differing justifications for the American shelling of Beirut and the nation's two top Pentagon leaders publicly disputed the White House account of when President Reagan decided to redeploy U.S. Marines in Lebanon.

Meanwhile, one administration official reportedly said the phased withdrawal of the Marines from the Beirut airport area could take as long as "early summer."

The shelling is solely to defend the multinational force in Lebanon and not to prop up the country's tottering government, said White House spokesman Larry Speakes. He said the agreement with Congress authorizes shelling only for this purpose.

But Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger said defense of the Lebanese government was in fact one reason for the firing.

Speakes had said Reagan approved the redeployment plan "in principle" Feb. 1, but in an appearance before Congress, Gen. John Vessey, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, turned to Weinberger and said, "If the decision was made on the first of February, you and I spent an awful lot of time in meetings in the last week to no avail."

Congressional sources said Gen. P.X. Kelley, Marine commandant, was apparently unaware of Reagan's decision to order a phased withdrawal of the Marines in Lebanon when Kelley briefed senators about an hour before the president's announcement Tuesday.

The sources, who spoke only on condition they not be identified, said Kelley did not mention the redeployment decision during a closed session of the Senate Armed Services Committee late Tuesday afternoon. Kelley called members of the panel Wednesday to tell them that if he had been aware of the impending announcement, he would have given them more information than he did.

Consumers risk poor quality ordering products by phone

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

Ordering merchandise over the telephone may be convenient, but according to a representative of the K-State Consumer Relations Board, perhaps it should be done with the phrase "caveat emptor" in mind.

The phrase, meaning "let the buyer beware," points out that a consumer should take heed and make sure he gets the quantity and quality he has paid for.

People in a number of states have been experiencing telephone sales shams recently, and Manhattan residents should become aware of this, Kim Hefley, graduate in family economics and a director of the Consumer Relations Board, said.

"I don't think it's (telephone sales shams) that serious in Manhattan right now," Hefley said. "So far I don't know of anyone who has sent their money in. We don't usually hear about it until after the people get their merchandise and it's poor quality. Maybe in a couple of months we'll hear about them."

Hefley said there are a number of telephone sales schemes that attempt to persuade people to give out their Mastercard or Visa credit card numbers.

"In most orders made over the telephone, the company will ask for your charge card number," Hefley said. "Sometimes they're really sneaky about it, and unless you're really paying attention, it's easy to give out your number. They make it sound like they already have your number, and they just want to verify it."

Hefley said victims in several states have reported unauthorized billings to charge cards after the numbers had been given out over the telephone.

Wendy Weishaar, junior in home economics and a member of the board, received a call from a company called Trans World Industries that wanted to know her charge card number.

"She (the caller from the company) said she had a free gift for me worth up to $5,000, and I had already won one of five gifts," Weishaar said. "If I could verify I was a Visa or Mastercard holder, she would give me the gift and send their catalog with it."

Weishaar said at first she didn't want to deal with the person, but then decided to play along and get the name of the company.

After giving the expiration date of her charge card, the woman over the telephone told Weishaar the company's information showed her number began with the number four. Weishaar confirmed that, and the woman on the phone asked her if she would verify the rest of the number.

"I said, 'Why don't you read it to me?'" Weishaar said. "Well, they didn't have it (the number)."

Weishaar said she asked the woman why the company chose to call people with Visa or Mastercard charge cards.

"She said the merchandise in their catalog was comparable to that in Sears or Spiegel (sales catalogs), and people who ordered from those catalogs tended to use their Master-

A resolution supporting an extension of hours at Farrell Library was unanimously approved by Student Senate Thursday night.

One possibility is keeping the first three floors open until 12:30 a.m., said Jerry Katlin, student body president. All floors now close at 10:30 p.m.

Lack of money now blocks the extension of library hours. The major expense of extended hours is for personnel, Katlin said.

"They can't turn the heating or the cooling down or up from what it is because of the possibility of damage to the books," he said. "The costs of heating and cooling don't change whether there are students in the building or not. So the problem is paying for personnel to keep the library open."

K-State President Duane Acker is considering committing $200,000 to the library, Katlin said. This money would probably come from one of two sources, the $240,000 account set aside by Gov. John Carlin for library improvement or from the academic services support fee, he said.

"There is a problem — both these accounts were specifically designated for equipment purchases," he said. "We can't use funds from these accounts for personnel, we can only use them for computers, library acquisitions and other equipment."

Funds can be obtained by shifting money between accounts, Katlin said.

"You would have to take about $50,000 from the current library materials budget and shift it into personnel," he said. "Then take $200,000 from one of those two accounts and shift it back into the library budget. It's a little bit of a game, but it's a way you can get around some of these types of accounts that are specifically designated for library materials."

Katlin said extended hours were a top priority when proposals were presented to the budget planning board.

Acker must make the final decision on increasing library hours, Katlin said.

In other business, senate passed a bill revising the Student Governing Association constitution and bylaws. The bill was intended as a "housekeeping" measure, said Lori Leu, student senate chairman, when the bill received first reading last week.

First reading was heard on a bill which would change funding reviews for the K-State Union, Recreational Services and Student Publications from three to five years.

One of last year's academic quadrathlon winners is competing in the Midwest meeting of the American Society of Animal Scientists March 26-28 in Chicago.

Maryann Gilsdorf, graduate in animal sciences and industry, will present a research paper at the meeting and compete against students from eight other states for cash prizes.

"Evidence for Bovine FSH Binding Inhibitor" is the title of Gilsdorf's paper.

She studied the theory that protein and follicle fluid prevents the follicle stimulating hormone (FSH) at the ovarian level.

Her graduate work is in the area of reproductive physiology of beef cattle, and she currently has a research assistant position with Guy Kiracone, professor of animal sciences and industry.

Company representatives from the animal sciences industry are to be on hand for the presentations to listen for matters affecting their business, Gilsdorf said.

Quadrathlon team places first

Quadrathlon team King's Court placed first in the animal sciences quadrathlon finals Tuesday night.

The team will represent K-State at the regional competition March 26-28 in Chicago.

Team members include: Tracy King, senior in animal sciences and industry; Kathy Vink, junior in pre-veterinary medicine; Anita Conley, senior in animal sciences and industry; and Mark Squires, senior in animal sciences and industry.

Professor narrates blacks' history

By KIMBERLY STOLLE
Collegian Reporter

Black segregation has left its mark. Even today, the anger and scars of black segregation are alive through the memories of some Manhattan residents.

Philip Royster, associate professor of English, spoke about "Manhattan: A Black Perspective" Thursday as part of the "Let's Talk About It" series sponsored by the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee. His talk was based on an oral history project directed by Nupur Chaudhuri, Manhattan resident.

Royster teaches Afro-American Literature, Chicano Literature and Native American Literature in the English department.

"One of the things that we've determined in the last 20 or so years in the black community is that we're not satisfied with the histories that have been written about us or for us — the histories that we've usually been taught in school," Royster said. "We no longer believe the history is an objective topic that can be determined for all people by one person."

History is an interpretation or story, he said. The story reflects the storyteller's values, attitudes and views. Therefore, how the storyteller sees the world, the language used by the storyteller and the values of the storyteller are reflected in his story.

"No longer in the black community do we look at a traditional history book with the same kind of value that we use to look at them," Royster said.

Instead, the black community now values the stories told by other blacks which report experiences during the depressions and the hard times. It is through this oral history that people express their own views and stories. They tell the history as it was seen through their eyes, Royster said.

During the 1930s, the blacks were poor, but no one went hungry, he said. They ate rabbits and vegetables and used coal for fuel.

Royster quoted an elderly black Manhattan resident as he remembered the blacks' fight against the cold:

"It was all we had to burn then — wood and coal. And very few of us could buy it because we didn't have the money to buy it. So lots of times the train would come by and a bunch of us boys would get together, and we'd throw coal off the train as it came through. So that shows how hard times were."

Every Aug. 4, Emancipation Day was celebrated as a black holiday. Election day was connected with the holiday. Many times blacks were fed and catered to in order to obtain their vote, Royster said. He quoted a Manhattan citizen who remembered this holiday:

"We'd go up there in the park, and they gave a big feast. They brought the food and had somebody barbecue it and fix it, and that was our day."

Segregation of blacks from whites affected the Manhattan area as well as other parts of the country. Royster quoted a resident recalling the days of segregation:

"My grandma used to sit and tell about when they came and lived over on Bluemont. But then they cleared out here and moved us all out here."

Another citizen said, "Not up here (north and west parts of town), but down there back to Pottawatomie (Avenue). That's where the Negro was. Well, we couldn't go no further than 3rd (Street), Pottawatomie and Colorado (Streets). That's where the Negro could buy. You couldn't go up there. Oh no, no my God no! They didn't want you up there, and I ain't going up there now. They didn't want me at first; I ain't goin' now. Now that they (blacks) can go up there, and the urban renewal began and houses were built down there (south of Manhattan). You buy the lot and build your house. Some of those houses were good, and they just tore them down."

People have been segregated too long, they find triumph in it. Some blacks seem to resist integration, Royster said.

Enrollment decreases this spring

According to enrollment figures which became official Tuesday, K-State has enrolled 18,192 students this spring, of which 15,927 attend classes on campus and 1,847 attend off campus.

Registrar Donald Foster said the official figures, which are computed on the 20th day of classes each semester, show total enrollment down by 50 students from a year ago, when 18,242 students attended classes. On-campus head count is down 270 from a year ago, but the off-campus count is up 218 students. The College of Veterinary Medicine enrolled 418 students this spring, an increase of two.

Full-time equivalent (FTE) enrollment this spring is 16,323, down 306 from the 16,629 recorded in 1983.

The spring enrollment decline of 50 is considerably less than it was last fall, when K-State had an official enrollment of 18,470, down 1,027 from the previous fall semester, Foster said.

FTE enrollments are calculated by dividing total undergraduate hours by 15, veterinary medicine (pre-professional) credit by 12 and graduate credit by 9.

Senate hears testimony on budget bill

By MIKE TURNER
Government Editor

The Senate Education Committee heard strong testimony Thursday against a bill which would eliminate current budget limits for school districts in Kansas.

Craig Grant, director of political action for the Kansas National Educators' Association (K-NEA), said the bill would be likely to create "chaos and disruption." The important goal is to equalize the opportunity for education for all students.

Grant said some expected K-NEA to endorse the proposal because it would allow school districts the chance to increase their budgets by whatever amount is necessary to increase teacher salaries. However, practical realities call for equal educational opportunity, he said.

"There is a possibility for runaway disequalization to occur again in Kansas," Grant said.

Sen. Charlie Angell, R-Plains, said different school district budgets have risen between 106 percent and 512 percent during the 11 years from 1972-1973 to 1983-1984. He said schools are already exhibiting significant disequalization with the current legislation.

John Koepke, spokesman for the Kansas Association of School Boards, said wealth of a district is not a factor in budget limits. The amount a given district's total budget has risen is not necessarily indicative of that district's expenditures per pupil, he said.

Current budget limits are determined solely by expenditures per pupil, he said.

Koepke said the ultimate goal is not equal expenditures per pupil in school districts, but the opportunity for equal expenditures per pupil.

Many school districts with relatively small budgets do not have the opportunity to use the full budget they are authorized to use, Koepke said, because they cannot afford the mill levy required to support that level of educational expenses.

Legislature '84

There are many rural districts with very "education-minded" people on their school boards, Koepke said. They would like to collect more in property taxes to support education, but after three years of drought, they find the community simply cannot afford it, he said.

Sen. Wint Winter, R-Lawrence, said schools have two methods of funding. One is property taxes and the other is state funding.

Koepke said the state should start trying to provide more funding to school districts because "the fact of the matter is that local school boards cannot lay the burden on the farmers in their community."

Sen. Billy McCray, D-Wichita, asked Koepke how educational equalization would be affected if the Legislature lifted local budget limits and increased state aid.

"There would be more disequalization," Koepke said, because the poorer districts would reduce their budgets in anticipation of receiving more state funds.

Former KC fireman sues city for injuries

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A former fireman has sued the city for $5.6 million, claiming other firefighters deliberately collapsed a wall of a burning building on him and another officer because they were critical of department safety policies.

John Gasca was severely injured after the wall collapsed during a fire at a midtown apartment building on Feb. 9, 1979. Capt. Gideon Bennett was killed.

The suit, filed Monday in U.S. District Court, also names former City Manager Robert A. Kipp, former Fire Chief John H. Waas, former Deputy Chief Arnett Williams and Robert H. Patterson, assistant chief of fire prevention.

Gasca said he and Bennett were manning a hose in an alley on the north side of the burning building when parts of a wall began to collapse. Bennett and Gasca each asked Williams for permission to leave the area, but Williams ordered them to stay where they were, according to the suit.

Williams then "ordered a snorkel truck to direct a high-pressure stream of water on the north wall of the structure above and opposite" their position, causing the wall to collapse, the suit said.

Browning said a film of the fire, which was to be introduced as evidence at the trial, was currently used at the Fire Academy as an example of how not to fight a fire.

Black Heritage Month theme incorporates feminist history

By DIANE KERSTING
Collegian Reporter

"Black Women: Achievement Against the Odds" is the theme for Black Heritage Month during February.

The theme was taken from the title of a Kansas Committee for the Humanities (KCH) exhibit which will be displayed in the Minorities Resource/Research Center of Farrell Library next week. More than 100 black women who have made contributions to society will be featured in this 20-panel exhibit of text and illustration.

Black Heritage Month has been celebrated for 58 years. This year it is being jointly observed with Susan B. Anthony Week.

Susan B. Anthony was committed to the feminist cause shortly after attending her first Women's Rights Convention in Syracuse, N.Y., in 1852. She spent many years traveling throughout the United States speaking for women's rights. Susan B. Anthony Week coincides with her birthday, which is Feb. 15.

The Kansas Committee for the Humanities, the Ecumenical Christian Ministries, the Office of Minority Affairs, the Women's Resource Center and the Women's Studies Program are sponsoring a variety of activities and exhibits to celebrate the events.

Beginning and highlighting the joint observance of Black Heritage Month and Susan B. Anthony Week will be a program presented by Bernice Johnson Reagon titled "My Black Mothers and Sisters." It is scheduled for 7:30 p.m. in the Union Forum Hall.

Reagon is a cultural historian at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C., specializing in black American oral history, American protest culture, African Diaspora studies and performing arts traditions. She has been performing nationally and internationally since 1962 as a singer and composer. She is a member of the original Freedom Singers, organizer of the Atlanta-based Harambee Singers, and the founding member of a black women's ensemble called Sweet Honey in the Rock, which sings traditional and contemporary black American songs.

Reagon has conducted field research and consultations and has given many lectures throughout the United States, Africa and the Caribbean. She developed the documentary recording, "Voices of the Civil Rights Movement: 1955-1965," for the Smithsonian Collection of Recordings.

The Black Student Union is celebrating Black Heritage Month and their theme "God Bless the Child" with a black doll contest and a program on "The Black Child."

"BSU each year selects a theme around which they do their program — this year the focus is on the black child. They examine educational, economical and social status of black children," Anne Butler, director of educational support services and BSU adviser, said.

All entries in the black doll contest will be on display in the Union, and the winner will be announced Feb. 19.

Dr. Gilbert Parks will speak on "The Black Child" at 3 p.m. Sunday in the Ecumenical Christian Ministries building. The program also will include performances by Ebony Theater members.

"This has been a cooperative effort," Sue Rieger, assistant director of the Women's Resource Center, said. "The events we've planned are really exciting. I hope the students take advantage of Bernice Johnson Reagon's performance, because from what I've heard from those who have seen her in person, she's such an inspiring person."

Another exhibit, "The James Boyer Black History Collection," is on display in the lobby of Farrell. It is a pictorial history of such people as Ray Charles, Lena Horne, Arthur Ashe and Alex Haley — "those aspects of black history deemed significant for celebration at this time," according to the sign on the exhibit. This showing is only part of the complete collection. The complete exhibit contains nearly 100 posters and historical excerpts.

A third exhibit, "Original Art of Local Women," will be on display next week in the second-floor display case of the Union. Some of the artwork has been done by Natalya Hall.

Reggae/calypso musician John Bayley, sponsored by the Union Program Council Coffeehouse Committee, will perform at 8 p.m. today in the Union Caskeller. Tickets are available at the Union Activities Center or at the door the night of the show.

The Women of the Heartlands Choir will perform at noon Tuesday in the Caskeller.

A discussion of Alice Walker's Pulitzer Prize-winning book, "The Color Purple," will be led by Phyllis Bixler and Philip Royster, both associate professors of English. This is scheduled for noon Wednesday in Umberger 213.

The film documentary "Not A Love Story" will be shown at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday and 3:30 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. Thursday in the Union Little Theater for the afternoon showing and in Forum Hall for the evening showings. Following each presentation will be a discussion of the film.

Living group not campaign issue

Once again, K-State will have a run-off election to decide the student body president. And, once again, the two candidates have different living group backgrounds. It is hoped the campaign will not, as in the past, be reduced to a battle between the greeks and non-greeks.

Ken Heinz and Tracy Turner are both good candidates for student body president. They have both assumed leadership positions in various campus activities in the past.

Heinz said he believes improved campus lighting is one of the main issues to be addressed by the student body. Student recruitment has been and will continue to be Turner's major issue, he said.

These and other topics will be issues during the candidates' election run-off campaigns. Legislative and student issues pertaining to the University should be the only issues during the campaign. Such an outdated and irrelevant prejudice as living group affiliation should not become an issue of the campaign.

There are more than 17,000 students enrolled at K-State, and it would be foolish to assume that two candidates who collectively received 2,048 of the total 3,423 student votes would ignore the desires of the K-State campus to please only a small representation of the student body — their individual constituencies.

The campus has demonstrated in the past that such a sum of people can become a formidable influence when collectively working toward common goals. The student body president should be a student who is able to successfully lead the student body and convey student demands to University administration, the Kansas Legislature and the Board of Regents.

The student body should elect a president because of his stands and leadership ability, and not on the basis of his living group affiliation.

Restoring quality to education

This week President Reagan said "restoring good, old-fashioned discipline" to primary and secondary schools, instead of increasing education funding, is the real way to solve America's educational dilemma.

Reagan has asked for budget cuts for education, reiterating instead his principle that improving education means restoring discipline. True, money can't make miracles and unruly students hinder learning, but Reagan's insistence that classroom discipline will solve problems is far-fetched.

"In too many schools," Reagan said, "teachers lack authority to make students take tests, hand in homework, or even quiet down in class. And in some schools, teachers suffer verbal and even physical abuse."

This sounds like more of Reagan's unfounded rhetoric, and seems to be another emotional appeal for conservative support.

But Reagan has missed the mark. What has been recognized as low quality of education in American schools seemingly can be solved, the president believes, by reinforcing basic courses and strict disciplinary rules.

But he has failed to recognize the roots of decay: poorer teaching and learning attitudes. Neither unlimited spending nor authoritarian discipline can change an inherent ill concern for knowledge — both its wonders and benefits — that has eroded American education.

Hall voting reward creates unjust influence

Editor,

Re: "Voter reward draws candidate debate," in the Feb. 7 Collegian:

I was appalled Tuesday after reading about the Association of Residence Halls' decision to give $50 to the residence hall with the highest voter turnout.

If this University must resort to monetary rewards for voter turnout, why not award money to the college with the highest percentage of active voters? Why exclude all other students who turn out to vote? I would hope that residence hall residents would be motivated enough by a candidate's ideas, enthusiasm and mind than to have to be paid to vote. And in my eyes, ARH can be considered a special interest group since presidential candidate Ken Heinz resides in a residence hall.

What if, on the national level, the NAACP proposed to run a contest between inner cities with a high number of blacks, promising to pay the city with the highest voter turnout? Most likely this would be beneficial to the Rev. Jesse Jackson, but is it right? Or what if Wheeling-

Pittsburg Steel Co. picked out the 50 wealthiest counties across the United States and paid the one with the highest voter turnout a sum of money, also? Ronald Reagan may benefit, but certainly not all the other candidates proportionately. I am sure this would increase voter turnout, but not in a nationally diversified sense.

Voters in this country cast their ballot for the candidate they are most inclined to believe will do the best job and serve the country's interests best. Everyone is granted this right, and they don't have to be paid by a special interest group to do so. This is a very dangerous concept that should be stopped before it gets out of hand.

If ARH wanted just to increase voter awareness and participation, why not pay money to the residence hall with the highest turnout for the presidential candidate debate? Let's make aware, active voters out of our students instead of ignorant, active ones influenced by peer pressure and money.

Shepherd not actual 'Aussie'

Editor,

Re: Terri Baird's article, "Stitches: working to perfection," in the Feb. 8 Collegian:

I don't want to criticize Australian shepherds because I know several very nice ones (including Stitches), but I think some points in the article need to be clarified.

It isn't a "fact" where the breed developed. The closest thing to an Australian shepherd in Australia is a dog called a German coolie (collie), according to several Australian stockmen, from personal conversation or articles. The true Australian stock dogs are the cattle dog (Queensland heeler) and the Kelpie.

This isn't saying Australian shepherds aren't fine dogs, just that there is some question as to their being "Aussies."

Union display shows careful composition

Editor,

Re: Kecia Stolfus' editorial, "Display defacement is a disgrace," in the Feb. 8 Collegian:

As a student coordinator of Black History Month activities, one of my projects was the tribute to black Americans that was displayed in the Union. I was stunned, then extremely angry when I read the racial slurs on the display.

I was somewhat pleased with the media coverage of this historical event until I read Stolfus' editorial. I call special attention to the third paragraph and I quote: "One fact must be admitted: the display, in observance of Black History Month, was crudely taped to the outside of the glass display case on the first floor of the Union."

The materials on display were carefully taped to construction paper, which covered the glass; furthermore, the tape used could not even be seen. The people who worked hard and volunteered their time and energies to this exhibit were highly ticked off. Stolfus' sarcasm totally undermines her so-called concern for the issue. Her insinuations are in poor taste.

Fighting the Kansas stereotype

(Editor's note: Nancy Malir, junior in journalism and mass communications and a fall 1983 Collegian staff writer, is spending three months in Washington, D.C., as a Sears Congressional Intern in the office of Rep. Thomas M. Foglietta, D-Penn. This semester she will write a weekly column about her experiences in the nation's capital.)

WASHINGTON — For months, I psychologically prepared myself for the inevitable conflict. Wretched memories of past encounters angered me; expectations of future confrontations made me tense.

Questions of doubt kept penetrating my apprehensive mind as the days grew closer. How would I deal with my attackers? Would I be able to maintain my dignity throughout the ordeal and leave the battle scene emotionally unscathed? Or would I snap from the pressure, succumb to the abuse, cry from the pain?

I had a right to be a part of this foreign empire, but more importantly, I told myself, the enemy would not defeat me with mind games and psychological warfare. I would hold my ground and maintain my sanity.

But still, the agonizing dread of the inescapable first challenge made life excruciatingly unbearable for the first few days in Washington.

I didn't have long to wait. On the second day of my journey into foreign territory, I encountered my first assailant.

It happened in the basement of the Connecticut Connection in downtown Washington, D.C. While my roommate and I innocently shared a lunch table with a lone salesman, he suddenly revealed his true antagonistic identity and fired the first shot.

"Where are you from?" he asked. "Iowa," Melanie said. "Kansas," I said — and waited. The attack was immediate. "Kan-sass!" he mimicked slowly, with a malicious grin. "How are Dorothy and Toto?"

I managed a chuckle. "I don't know. I never met them."

First counterattack: successful.

The conversation wound another direction, but soon another confrontation arose. While the salesman-turned-foe was describing the city's various nightspots, he suddenly stopped and looked at me with piercing eyes.

"What kind of music do you like? Country?"

"New wave," I replied, and watched his eyeballs temporarily leave their sockets.

Smug and self-complacent, I left the cafe. My two defensive strategies had served me well: I was mentally prepared — he hadn't caught me off guard — and I had launched quick and decisive counterattacks.

I was confident the three months in Washington would sharpen my skills in defending assaults on my statehood.

But I was too cocky too soon. I didn't handle my second encounter with nearly as much finesse as the first.

While discussing my office responsibilities with my Congressman's administrative assistant, he commented on my biographical sketch.

"I see you're very liberal," he said excitedly.

The sudden fear that gripped me momentarily disrupted my concentration, and I was mentally unprepared for the surprise attack that soon followed. Being called liberal in Kansas is one thing, but being called liberal by an employee of a Congressman who has received a 100 rating from the AFL-CIO is quite another. My central nervous system, rooted in Midwestern sensibilities, began to tingle.

"Well," I said slowly, "I'm liberal for Kansas, but that isn't saying much, considering 63 percent of my district is against the ERA."

And then, unwittingly, I set myself up for the blow.

With a burst of self-amused laughter, I added, "My dad told me before I left that whenever I expressed an opinion here, I was to make sure you all knew it wasn't necessarily representative of the rest of the state."

The aide chuckled. "We'll just assume the rest of the state is abnormal."

Though intended to be indirect, the comment unnerved me. I could tell my parents, neighbors, and anyone else west of Salina they were ignorant, but Rocky Balboa's cousin couldn't!

Worked into a corner, I let the statement go.

One more assault on my origins — this time simply a friendly observation by a fellow intern from Hawaii, completed the first week of combat.

While attending another intern's party, Karen eyed me from top to bottom and queried, "Is that the way people in Kansas dress?"

What was obviously troubling her was the knee-length pink sweatshirt I was wearing — definitely contrary to the Kansas farm girl stereotype.

Her sincere puzzlement amused me.

"No," I replied, "it's the way I dress. But what did you expect? Bib overalls, a corn-cob pipe and a pig under one arm?"

"You really don't look like someone from Kansas," she said with a giggle.

I know an underhanded compliment when I hear one. But I still explained, for the sake of the folks back home, that hoop skirts and top hats had disappeared from Kansas at least a decade ago.

Winning every battle isn't necessary to win a war, but I'm certain that final victory will be mine.

By my estimation, I will come into contact with at least a hundred people who will come to realize that every Kansan doesn't live in a barn or make religious pilgrimages to the Great Oz.

And I won't blush when I say, "I'm from Kansas."

Jackson revitalizes party structure

WASHINGTON — An incident at a college lecture hall last week suggests why the Rev. Jesse Jackson's presidential campaign could become a cause celebre among younger voters.

During a question-and-answer session at Georgetown University, a student long-windedly asked Jackson whether the candidate, as president, would spend billions of dollars on social programs when the benefits of such spending were unclear.

Sensing a possibly bigoted undertone to the question, other students in the audience hissed. But Jackson gracefully grasped the lectern with one hand and motioned for silence with the other.

"Part of our job (in this campaign) is to hear people and let them hear us," the preacher explained in quintessential Jackson form. "To be patient in the transition as people develop is important. Your obligation is to dialogue. A no-talk policy and a laugh-at-other-people policy is not a good policy."

Ten years ago, a more confrontational Jackson might have handled his tendentious inquisitor with something less than an olive branch. His obviously non-combative posture today partly reflects the secure role that the civil rights leader has carved for himself in Democratic political circles as a result of his efforts in Syria on behalf of Navy pilot Robert Goodman.

But Jackson isn't really campaigning for president as much as he is for the unofficial position of Democratic Party conscience. He's called not only for Ronald Reagan's defeat, but also for a more representative party structure and ideological consistency. For that reason his candidacy is different from the others and possibly more appealing to those who can appreciate someone willing to challenge the party internally.

A packed and appreciative house at generally conservative Georgetown may indicate why

Jackson has brought his sermon to 40 campuses in the last two months. If anybody can appreciate the reverend's unconventional approach, politician-weary college students can.

...

Just as the Democrats are trying to attract blacks and women, the only two black women in the House — Democrats Cardiss Collins of Illinois and Katie Hall of Indiana — face tough primary battles. Collins' chief primary opponent, also black, has been endorsed by Chicago Mayor Harold Washington. Meanwhile, Hall, who was appointed to her seat after the death of an incumbent, may have to fend off three white challengers.

...

An army judge recently issued a decision that might be of interest to women who are considering a part-time military career. Joseph H. Rouse, chief of the general claims division of the U.S. Army Claims Service at Fort Meade, Md., ruled that a former reservist could not collect damages from the Army for the rape she suffered while quarantined in her barracks.

The victim, Betty Ann Buckmiller, 26, has since filed suit against the Army in U.S. District Court in San Francisco.

Health foods verses processed foods

Americans' eating habits spark debate

By JANET HELM
Contributing Writer

America's food supply is a subject of continual debate.

Some people are alarmed by the misuse of chemical additives, pesticides and fertilizers, claiming processed foods are robbed of all nutritional value.

Others insist Americans have the safest food supply in the world and are well-fed without the use of so-called health foods.

Jimmy Durante once said health foods don't actually make you live longer, they only make it seem longer. Nevertheless, an increasing number of people are convinced food in supermarkets is more nutritious than nutritious and are turning to the health food store for salvation.

Articles in Prevention magazine, a monthly magazine for the lay person focusing on health and organic and natural foods, regularly speak of the "poisons" in food. It expresses yearnings for a return to the 100-percent-natural way of life.

Don Stillings, a Manhattan health food store owner, used the quote of a California university nutrition professor to describe his own feelings about today's food:

"The typical American diet is a disaster. If I fed it to pigs and cows without adding any vitamin or mineral supplements, I would wipe out the livestock industry," he said.

"We're designed to eat food in its raw state," Stillings said. "Biochemically, the fuel you're designed to run on is food in an unadulterated, unaltered state."

Stillings said Americans need to change their eating habits and should begin by eating food that has been processed as little as possible. This can be done by eliminating white sugar and white flour, which he said are empty calories that don't nourish the body.

"When you ingest that (white flour and sugar), your system goes, 'I don't recognize this, this is not fruit,' which is the only simple carbohydrate the body recognizes," he said.

"Your body will put that simple carbohydrate in fat storage every time because it doesn't know what to do with it. You don't have any enzymes to digest that thing."

Stillings advocates replacing white sugar with honey because honey is more natural and it "doesn't take the pancreas and run it into an insulin shock."

"They call us food faddists, and to be real honest, the modern mass-marketing of food and processing is a fad that will die out," Stillings said. "It's got to; people are dying from it. It is literally depriving them of nutrition."

Carole Harbers, assistant professor of foods and nutrition, disagrees. The problem is not with today's food supply, but with people's eating habits, she said.

Harbers said she doesn't like the term "junk food." The phrase "junkie eating habits" is more appropriate, she said.

Sugar, in any form, is a calorie-dense food offering little nutrients other than carbohydrate and should be used in moderation, Harbers said.

Replacing white sugar with honey (also a sugar) should be made only because of taste preference, because both are metabolized by the body in similar ways, she said.

Harbers said the body recognizes all food. The digestion processes of white flour and whole-wheat flour are similar. The only thing "you don't have enzymes to digest," as Stillings said, is the bran in the whole-wheat flour, a source of dietary fiber, she said.

People can benefit from the fiber in whole-grain products but other foods, such as fresh fruits and vegetables, also are good sources of fiber. Preference should be the deciding factor in choosing whole-wheat over white flour, she said.

Products made from white flour are nutritious and do not contain empty calories because the flour has been enriched, she said. Nutrients lost in processing are added back into the product.

Cliff Meloan, professor of chemistry and science adviser to the Food and Drug Administration, said he disagrees with many of the claims made by the "natural foods movement."

His opinion of the nation's food supply, based on his own involvement with the FDA, is that it is safe. Meloan said scare tactics are often used to promote natural, unprocessed foods.

"Why should you buy a natural food product unless you're scared of eating what you're eating," he said. "The more they can scare you, the more you're going to want to buy their product. That's just one of their marketing techniques."

"I know from first-hand experience," Meloan said, "that the pesticide and industrial chemical residues (of processed foods) are not anywhere near a level that would be of concern."

Meloan takes part in the FDA's Market Basket Surveys, which monitor intentional food additives (substances purposely put into foods to give them desirable characteristics) and incidental food additives (those that get into foods by accident, such as pesticides and other pollutants). These surveys are conducted 30 times a year in different areas of the country. The chemical analyses are performed in the Kansas City, Mo. district office of the FDA.

Meloan said the surveys are based on the diet of a 19-year-old male — the segment of the population found to eat the most food.

The surveys are conducted by finding the amount and kind of food eaten by this group in a two-week time period, buying these foods in the public market, dividing them into categories and chemically analyzing the categories for the presence and concentrations of residues.

"The levels of these residues are very low," Meloan said. "They're so low in most cases that 10 years ago they would not have been detectable. I have no real quarrels with the organic gardener," he said. "I think that those people are good people and they produce a good product. The difficulty is that we've got hundreds of millions of people to feed, and to try to do it with those methods when 3 percent of our nation's people are farmers is just not going to work."

American Heart Association

WERE FIGHTING FOR YOUR LIFE

Meloan said many of the organically grown food and natural products are good, "but you pay a great deal for them."

A 1983 report in the Journal of The American Dietetic Association found the costs of foods sold in health food stores were often twice that of their conventional counterparts. Also, health foods were not found to be superior in appearance, taste or nutritional value. Two pesticides were detected in some of the organically grown vegetables.

Meloan said periodic checks are made on natural foods in the Market Basket Surveys. Pesticides have been found in these foods, he said, but similar to conventional foods, the levels were below established tolerance levels.

"The food you get is the best buy in the world today," Meloan said. He recommended that people not shun the supermarkets for a more "natural" alternative.

Soviets dock with space station

MOSCOW — Three cosmonauts docked their Soyuz T-10 spacecraft with the orbiting Salyut-7 space station Thursday, about 26 hours after they blasted off from a base in Soviet Central Asia, the official Tass news agency reported.

The commander of the flight is Col. Leonid Kizim, whose last mission was in 1980 and included a 12-day stay aboard the orbiting Salyut-6, forerunner of the Salyut-7 space station.

The crew members are Vladimir Solov'yev, 37, and Oleg Atkov, 34. The last Soviet space flight was 150 days and ended Nov. 23 when Vladimir Lyakhov and Alexander Alexandrov returned to Earth.

Soviet space officials have said that a launching pad accident in September caused another space flight to be aborted and resulted in a longer stay in space for Lyakhov and Alexandrov. The cosmonauts whose mission was aborted escaped serious injury, officials said.

Dog mauling trial to be moved

ANTHONY — The Kansas Supreme Court will now decide the location for the trial of a man whose two pit bull terrier dogs killed an elderly Harper woman.

Harper County Judge William Yandell granted a change of venue request Wednesday saying it would be "difficult to attain a fair and impartial jury" in the Harper County area for the trial of David Scott Reynolds, 19.

Reynolds is charged with involuntary manslaughter and two counts of allowing a dangerous animal to run loose in the Oct. 22 death of Grace Parsons, 67. She was found unconscious near Reynolds' two dogs and died a short time later of wounds to her arms, throat and head. The dogs were confiscated by authorities and are being kept by a veterinarian.

Tom Weilert, a Wichita attorney representing Reynolds, argued that publicity in the area would prejudice a jury's decision. He also said the trial should be moved because many potential jurors knew the victim.

Kansas judges grant changes of venue only once or twice a year, said Ron Keefe, a spokesman for the state Supreme Court.

The trial had been scheduled April 24 in Anthony, the county seat.

Welch settles case out of court

LONDON — Actress Raquel Welch has accepted a large damage settlement and an apology from a men's magazine which published bogus nude photos of her.

Her attorney, Patrick Milmo, told High Court Judge Sir James Comyn that three photos in the February 1982 issue of Club International were of another woman, and the actress "naturally felt outraged and degraded."

Milmo said Thursday that editors and publishers of the magazine had apologized for the "gross insult" and agreed to pay Welch a "large sum" in damages — which weren't specified — plus legal costs.

In exchange, he said, Welch was prepared to drop her libel action. "It is quite true that a mistake was made about the identity of the woman shown in these photographs," said attorney John Zeiger, representing the magazine.

"My clients wish to convey their unqualified apologies to Miss Welch for this unfortunate affair and for the hurt and embarrassment they have caused her," he said.

Panel debates prisoners' coed housing

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Male inmates might lose an excellent training opportunity if the Legislature prevents them from being housed at the Kansas Correctional Institute at Lansing, Corrections Secretary Michael Barbara said Thursday.

Barbara told the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee he opposes a measure which would ban the housing of male inmates at KCIL, which now houses 32 male and 157 female inmates.

Fred Braun Jr., the owner of Zephyr Products Inc., has hired many of the inmates at KCIL to work in his Leavenworth sheet metal plant, Barbara said.

Placing male and female inmates in different prisons would require Braun to bus inmates of two prisons to and from his plant, Barbara said.

"Who are we going to attract if we disillusion Fred Braun with all his enthusiasm and his zeal?" Barbara asked the committee.

The measure to ban "co-rections" — the housing of male and female inmates in one prison — was originally proposed by a legislative study committee which was concerned about pregnancies at KCIL.

The House Federal and State Affairs Committee has already killed one measure which would have banned co-correctional housing.

The Senate committee took no action on the measure Thursday.

Sen. Jan Meyers, R-Overland Park, praised Braun's effort.

"I really think it's important that they have this opportunity to get trained," she said. "They're not only earning money and learning. They're paying taxes."

The inmates earn $3.35 an hour working for Zephyr and pay $5 for room and board at the prison, as well as state, federal and Social Security taxes.

But Sen. Bill Morris, R-Wichita, objected to the Legislature "accommodating" Braun by allowing co-corrections to continue.

"Mr. Braun is telling the prison system what to do instead of the prison system telling Mr. Braun," he said.

Morris said he was also concerned about the "potential liability to the children born out of those pregnancies."

But Barbara said a ban on co-corrections was a drastic step to take to deal with a situation which has occurred "only four times in three years."

"Make it a management problem — which means me," Barbara said. "Then you can call me on the carpet when this problem arises."

"We should handle this situation in the same way we handle one man raping another in an all-male facility."

But Morris said pregnancies were not the only problem with co-corrections.

"Some of these women are harassed and feel intimidated and don't even go to the recreation room," Morris said.

When Barbara said he had heard no reports of harassment, Sen. Edward Reilly, R-Leavenworth and the committee's chairman, said he has also heard reports of harassment from women inmates.

"The women inmates have let me know, if they're not letting you know," Reilly said.

The committee also heard testimony from Barbara on a measure which would require women to undergo evaluations which are "substantially equal" to those given to male inmates.

Current state law requires that the evaluations be "similar."

"We're very much in support of the measure," Barbara said. "Women are entitled to a full potential evaluation."

Barbara said he "was satisfied we're doing as thorough a job evaluation the women as we do for the men." But he added that advocates of the measure probably want that equality of treatment mandated by statute instead of dependent upon the policies of a particular corrections administrator.

Universities, faculty dispute idea possession

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A professor of computer sciences has been working all day on a knotty problem. He goes home, frustrated, and at the dinner table the answer suddenly hits him. He's elated; he's found his solution.

But is it his?

Or does it belong to his university? Millions of dollars are riding on questions like this, and the issue of "intellectual property" has led to skirmishing between universities and faculty.

As rapid changes in technology offer to shower riches on those who can stay one step ahead, some universities and researchers are taking a close look at updating long-standing rules on their professors' involvement in businesses.

The nine-campus University of California hopes to have a new Council on Intellectual Property — composed of faculty and administrators — operating within the next few months.

The council, which replaces the university's Board of Patents, will try to sort out such issues as when a professor's time is his own and when it is the university's, as well as how much involvement professors can have with businesses.

Among the other institutions reviewing or revising policies toward intellectual property are Stanford University, the California Institute of Technology, Yale University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

"When a professor comes up with an idea at the dinner table, is it his or his employer's?" said Jack Brown, a Phoenix, Ariz., attorney who is an authority on "intellectual property."

At Yale University in New Haven, Conn., Roger C. Schank, chairman of the computer sciences department, said attempts by some universities to restrict professors' business involvement may be short-sighted.

"When you are sitting on a new technology like computers, you don't want to force brilliant professors to make a choice between teaching and business," said Schank.

In general, universities permit professors to be consultants to businesses or to serve on boards of businesses, but prohibit them from holding operating positions, such as president, on grounds that such jobs are time-consuming and distract professors from their academic roles.

Computer scientists, like professors who write books, find their work falls under copyright law, instead of federal patent regulations that have traditionally guided ownership of scientific inventions, including those coming from genetic engineering research.

"Someone can write a book, and that's his," said Dennis Meredith, spokesman for the California Institute of Technology in Pasadena, Calif. "But if he writes a book and puts a floppy (computer) disc in it, then it's another matter."

Stephen Wolfram, a 24-year-old physicist, and Brian K. Reid, a computer scientist, represent different ends in the dispute.

Wolfram defected two years ago from the California Institute of Technology to the Institute for Advanced Study in Princeton, N.J., after a bitter dispute with Caltech over ownership of a computer program that Caltech spokesman Tom Branigan said is designed to manipulate very complicated algebraic expressions. Because of its speed, the program was believed to have commercial as well as scientific applications.

The company that is using Wolfram's program is paying royalties both to Caltech and Wolfram, but the matter is unresolved and may go to litigation.

Before signing on in Princeton, Wolfram worked out an agreement. "It's very simple, really," he said. "I own anything I do, but I will give a share to the institute."

Reid, now a computer scientist at Stanford University in Palo Alto, is still bitter about the whole idea of profit-making academics after a clash at Carnegie-Mellon University in Pittsburgh, where he used his spare time while a graduate student to develop a text-formatting computer program called Scribe. Reid said he didn't consider marketing the program until a professor suggested it might be valuable, bought the rights from Reid and started a company to sell it. The university also claimed the program.

"I got sucked to the tar-pit of business," said Reid, who has received about $120,000 in royalties from the program since 1980.

Scuba club to display diving tank

The K-State Scuba Diving Club will demonstrate scuba diving during All-University Open House in March to gain the interest of prospective members.

The demonstration will be given in a tank 6 feet in diameter by 8 feet deep.

"The tank is a common thing to display and demonstrate scuba gear," George Halazon, associate professor in extension communication development and club adviser, said.

"We're here, but nobody knows about us," Aaron Rice, sophomore in construction science, said about the club.

"The club teaches scuba diving free of charge, and our adviser can certify the divers," Rice said. "At a dive shop it would cost $150 plus equipment costs to get certified at the basic level."

To prevent drownings, divers must have certification to rent, buy or fill tanks, Rice said. Certification is received through the Professional Association of Diving Instructors (PADI).

"Certification is hardly ever denied if you stick with it until you get the information down. The instructors will generally take the extra time to see that you get your certification," Rice said.

The club takes diving trips and makes ecological dives to clean lake bottoms.

Amateur radio operators take hobby seriously

Radios reach out to 40 countries, 36 languages

By LILLIAN ZIER
Collegian Reporter

They talk to friends across campus, as well as around the world, but they don't use a telephone. They even pick up communications from outer space.

They are licensed amateur radio operators, also known as ham radio operators.

At K-State, 12 students belong to the campus Amateur Radio Club. The club owns three ham radio stations located on the fourth floor of Seaton Hall, with antennas on Ahearn Field House.

Some members of the club have communicated with citizens of the Soviet Union. The Soviets avoid long conversations, said David Yoder, assistant instructor of housing and club activities coordinator. They talk about weather and where they are located, but they won't talk about their occupations or lifestyle, he said.

"I listen to Radio Australia," Yoder said. "They broadcast news, music and features on Australia. It's virtually the same for any station."

Another feature of shortwave radio is listening to foreign stations over transceivers (combination receiver-transmitters).

Leroy Buller, temporary assistant professor of journalism and mass communications, said he listens to the British Broadcasting Corporation or Radio Moscow.

"It's propaganda," Buller said. "They've (Radio Moscow) been haranguing us about our presence in Lebanon, and they took us to task about Grenada. They go on and on about how poor and decadent the United States is."

Buller is a charter member of the Manhattan Area Radio Society, which has about 30 members. He is a former member of the K-State Amateur Radio Club.

"It's (the K-State club) been around since 1926," he said. "In 1973 we decided to upgrade the equipment. We started raising money. In 1976 we bought three fairly new stations. We had five members (and) no money from SGA (Student Governing Association) or anybody. We sent letters and scrounged around. People gave us stuff which we sold at flea markets and were able to buy our equipment."

Through shortwave radio, Buller has made friends throughout Europe and has some "real good friends in Australia."

He also has a standing invitation from a man in New Zealand. "If I pay air fare, he'll pay all my expenses once I get there. He'd like to trade houses over Christmas because he's never seen snow," Buller said.

Buller also keeps track of old friends from his years as a K-State student.

"A bunch of ham buddies from K-State get together (via radio) three times a week. I talk to friends in Mississippi, Arizona and Minnesota," he said.

About 40 countries broadcast to the United States. Shortwave receivers pick up as many as 36 different languages. Some of them are Voice of America programs being broadcast from the United States to other countries. Buller said many transmissions are in French or Spanish.

The club also received a transmission from Owen Garriot, an astronaut on the STS 9 shuttle mission Dec. 6, 1983. Standing on the roof of Seaton, members held an antenna by hand, moving it in the direction of the shuttle.

"We heard him on three occasions," Owen said. "He was never able to hear us. We could hear him on hand-held radios. He described things he was seeing. He heard about 170 calls (from the earth) and 20 more partial calls."

About 400,000 amateur radio operators are licensed in the United States. Another 400,000 operate around the world.

"I got interested up here and found friends carrying hand-held radios," Maryse Schultz, graduate in grain science, said. "It was fun to call people while walking around campus."

Ham radio is regulated by the Federal Communications Commission. They can be used to transmit only for personal, non-commercial use, and they must be licensed.

"There are five different classes of licenses," Yoder said. "The novice (beginner) can only use Morse code. The next four classifications can use voice transmission. They are technician, general, advanced and extra. Most operators in the United States are general operators."

Enthusiasts say that though ham radio's main function is as a hobby, it can also serve the public. If disaster strikes, ham operators are sometimes able to take over communications.

The city of Manhattan financed a project of the Manhattan Area Radio Society to turn a used ambulance into an emergency communication vehicle.

"We are a reliable means of communication. We are very organized," Owen said. "We can supplement the military to help in anything — civil defense preparedness or search and rescue. We have manpower and radios."

Ham operators frequently run a message coast-to-coast to see how long it takes to cross the nation. Sometimes the message never reaches its destination; sometimes it takes less than 20 minutes.

During an emergency, all rules may be suspended, Owen said. When the tornado disaster struck Topeka a year ago, the police began using ham radio channels on their own equipment, when the four channels usually allotted to the police were overloaded.

"Under normal circumstances that is totally illegal," he said.

House listens to pros, cons of tax exemption for aircraft

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The property tax exemption which the 1982 Legislature granted to aircraft starting in the 1983 tax year has cost the city of Wichita $700,000 in taxes, a House committee was told Thursday.

Mary Ellen Conlee, lobbyist for the city of Wichita, urged the House Assessment and Taxation Committee to pass a measure which would put commercial aircraft, those which carry passengers or cargo for a fee, back on the property tax rolls.

All other aircraft used for personal business would continue to receive the exemption, which went into effect Dec. 31, 1982.

Charles Belt, a spokesman for the Wichita Chamber of Commerce, opposed the measure.

"A number of jobs around the state, particularly in Wichita, have arisen as a result of this exemption," Belt said. "A number of airplanes have moved into the state, especially Mid-Continent. If this goes off, they'll leave the state."

The committee took no action on the measure, but several committee members said they were concerned about requiring small commercial aircraft to pay property taxes.

Rep. Homer Jarchow, D-Wichita, one of the measure's sponsors, said he supported removing the tax exemption on commercial aircraft because he believes the Legislature did not intend to exempt those aircraft when it passed the property-tax legislation two years ago.

The value of aircraft reported to the Sedgwick County appraiser increased from $36.6 million in 1982 to $63.6 million in 1983. But only $8.6 million worth of the aircraft reported in 1983 were commercial aircraft.

Artist adjusts to photographing U.S.

By ANGIE SCHARNHORST
Arts and Entertainment Editor

Photographs taken by Hurriyet Aydogan, a fifth-year student in mechanical engineering, are currently on display in second-floor student lounge in Durland Phase II.

Aydogan, a native of Ankara, Turkey, said he had to learn to adjust to taking photographs in the United States after training as a photographer in his native country.

"When I came to the United States, it was hard for me to get used to it as far as photography," he said. "I didn't see the same landscapes or the same faces. It was all new. It surprised me, although I didn't expect to find the same things."

Included in the exhibit, which will run through Feb. 17, are photographs of Turkish landscapes, portraits, campus news and sports photography.

Aydogan said he became interested in photography when his sister was born.

"I wanted to take pictures of her, so I bought a camera. It made me really happy."

"When I came to the United States at age 18, I was pretty much known in photography in Turkey," he said. "I was known among photographers nationwide."

"People keep saying, 'Why aren't you (majoring) in photography instead of engineering?' Aydogan said. "I would like to help my society through engineering. I think I can carry out some photography, also, but I want to do something useful in Turkey."

People often question the fact that his work is in black and white, he said, adding that he considers the medium more of a challenge than color photography.

"Black and white is more classic," Aydogan said. "Color is the easy way. You can impress someone just with color — see if you can do the same thing with black and white. It is just more challenging." Aydogan included with the exhibition a comments notebook, in which the viewers of the exhibit are encouraged to write about the individual photographs. This is a custom in Turkey, he said.

"It's really amazing, certain pictures that are the least favorite of some people are the favorite of others. I really didn't expect that."

Student actors present play analyzing society

By KIMBERLY STOLLE
Collegian Reporter

After three years of writing and developing it, Ramona Lucius, will finally see her original play, "Flying," in production.

The K-State Players will present Lucius' play Feb. 16-18 in the Purple Masque Theatre.

"Flying," a two-act comedy directed by Norman Fedder, professor of speech, is a statement about society's strict interpretation of sex roles.

The plot, centered around four main characters, is based upon a woman's desire to be an airplane pilot and a man's desire to be a mother, said Lucius, graduate student in English.

She was inspired to write the play due to her own insecurities about life's direction, she said.

"Right after I got my bachelor's degree, I was trying to decide what to do with my life. As an English major, there wasn't very much open to me."

"I had been in the Army before, so I thought in the back of my mind, 'If nothing else, maybe I'll join the military again,'" Lucius, who is a single parent, said.

"As I started thinking along those lines, I remembered there is a rule in the military that single parents are not allowed to join; they have to get married," she said.

"So I took off on that train of thought. What if I did want to join the Army? How would I go about getting a husband so that I could be married and able to enlist? And what kind of events would happen?" she said she remembered asking herself.

After toying with the question of re-enlisting in the Army, Lucius abandoned the idea, and instead developed the plot and characters for "Flying."

The four central characters include Isabell McNaughton, a woman who wants to join the Air Force; Sandy Wheatley, a young man who decides he wants to mother a child; Maj. Herrick, Isabell's career-oriented ex-husband; and Sgt. B.J. Holloway, a female Air Force mechanic who thinks of men as tools to other means, Lucius said.

"Parts of the characters come from people I know, and each of the characters has one part of my personality in it," she said.

"If there is a message in the play, it would be that it's OK to pursue whatever goals you want for your life. Society, your friends around you, and your family shouldn't be allowed to dictate," Lucius said.

Despite Pacino, movie lacks depth

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

When Fidel Castro opened the Port of Mariel and invited Americanized Cubans to pick up their relatives, he also emptied his prisons, forcing 25,000 criminals onto the boats.

Director Brian De Palma has used this as the starting point for the film "Scarface," his character study of one of these Cubans, Tony Montana (Al Pacino).

Review

While Howard Hawks' 1932 "Scarface" took place in Chicago, De Palma's updating shifts the scene to Miami. Instead of immigrant Italians getting rich selling alcohol, the immigrant Cubans are becoming rich by selling cocaine.

This milieu is a definite change from the Hitchcock-styled thrillers "Blow Out" and "Dressed to Kill" that we have come to expect from De Palma. In many ways, though, "Scarface" is still a dreamlike vision of life. De Palma surrounds the characters with the garrish world of the nouveau riche. It is wealth to such an extreme that the film's characters have their own little fantasy worlds to act in.

When Tony Montana first lands in Miami, he has nothing going for him except his own intense desire for money and power. One of the first scenes in the film — the infamous chainsaw scene that had to be edited to keep "Scarface" from receiving an X rating — shows Tony being forced to watch as his friend's limbs are amputated. Tony is supposed to break down and tell the attackers where they can find money that they are trying to extort. Instead, he remains quiet, knowing that if he can keep his poise, his friends will arrive and save him. If he gives in, he will have lost the money and the faith of the crime boss who entrusted him with the money. To not lose that chance to climb up the ladder is of the utmost importance to him. His friends mean very little to him if they are obstructing his path.

Very soon afterwards, due to the impressions he has made on his employers, Tony begins to rise to the top in the crime world. His craving for power is so strong that he doesn't want just his share, but everyone else's as well. He shows his power through his vulgarity. When talking to other crime figures, he spews out vulgarities while knowing that they must sit back and listen if they are to do business with him. It is a weapon that he brandishes against anyone he feels might have an advantage on him. Even after becoming a millionaire, he revels in his vulgarity instead of attempting to become sophisticated.

Although "Scarface" has very much going for it — a brilliant performance by Pacino and the very stylized direction of De Palma — the film lacks any focus. The first hour of "Scarface" presents many interesting developments that stretch the limits of credibility, but could be easily accepted. They are accepted only if the film will ultimately supply some pay off. In "Scarface," though, the pay off never comes.

The most notable flaw is an incest sub-plot concerning Tony and his younger sister. She represents the only thing pure in his life, and not surprisingly he is very protective of her. This protection turns into an infatuation. This theme was present in Hawks' version as well, but De Palma fails to successfully integrate it with the story of Tony's rise. Every half hour Tony has another scene with his sister, but the same points are repeated without trying to advance the incest theme any farther. This is typical of most of the film. "Scarface" rarely gets below Tony's surface. Instead, Tony is only shown to be acting.

"Scarface" completely lacks any of the fast pacing that has characterized De Palma's early work. De Palma seems to believe that throwing tremendous sets and vast amounts of blood at the audience will be sufficient to sustain interest. The major problem is the screenplay. Scenes drag along without any dialogue that is very interesting. When there is interesting dialogue, the characters repeat the same poses for excruciatingly long durations. Maybe if the scope of the screenplay had been narrower, the film would have seemed more cohesive. Tony Montana is simply not a complex enough character to hold an audience's attention for three hours. Visually the film is fascinating, with brilliantly choreographed violence, but ultimately the style is very empty.

Album expands band's style

LP displays X's wry humor

By ANGIE SCHARNHORST
Arts and Entertainment Editor

 1/2

X was always a darling of the Los Angeles punk establishment.

They were one of the few true punk bands to have broken out of the local club market to tour extensively throughout the country — including the conservative Midwest.

Like many punk bands, X has something significant to say through their music. Unlike many punk bands, X has a clever way to say it.

Review

The band that has been recording songs like "When Our Love Passed Out on the Couch," "Your Phone's Off the Hook, But You're Not," and "The World's a Mess, It's In My Kiss," has outdone themselves with their fourth album "More Fun In The New World." The album features the same sharp-tongued lyrics as the band's earlier albums, but uses a smoother musical delivery to drive the point home.

Smooth, in a punk sense, could be taken to be synonymous with sell-out. In the case of "More Fun In The New World," the change is a progression instead. X has not slightly altered instrumental styles, for all appearances, to accommodate a desire to be popular or make money, but because progression is a necessity for any band that does not wish to stagnate. They exhibit so much raw energy that it would be impossible to imagine them stagnating.

This raw energy, although much more prevalent in live performances, is the force that makes "More Fun In The New World" a strong album. No X LP would ever be called enjoyable — more appropriate terms would be "intense" or "captivating" — but this album definitely is as it is titled, "More Fun." Not clean-cut fun, but more fun because of, not in spite of, that fact.

The overwhelmingly significant aspect of the album is the lyrics, for the most part written by lead singer Exene Cervenka and her husband, bassist and vocalist John X. Doe. The two, who met through their poetry, have an unusual and wry grasp of life in the eighties. One example of their startling lyrical style is "I Must Not Think Bad Thoughts," which examines the question of national aggression.

When is this world coming to?
Both sides are right but both sides murder
I give up, why can't they?
I must not think bad thoughts

The civil wars and the uncivilized wars
Conflagrations leap out of every poor furnace

The food cooks poorly and everyone goes hungry
From then on its dog eat dog, dog eat body and body eat dog

Cervenka and Doe use the track "Make the Music Go Bang," from "More Fun In The New World" to examine the issue of their music as well as national affairs. Many bands make vain attempts at this, but X is one of the few to adequately sum up the attitudes of those who listen to their music.

I've seen a lot of people with plenty of guts.

They say 'make my music new & loud & rough'

Give it a beat or give it a twang
In a dark sweaty bar it's the same damn thing

Bang, Bang, make the music go bang
Brilliant, shining and nasty
Bang, Bang make the music go bang

The music that supports Doe and Cervenka's talented, if sometimes obscure lyrics, is almost as strong. The instrumentals support rather than battle with the lyrics, something which is sometimes nonexistent in music in the punk genre.

Guitarist Billy Zoom is particularly talented. Although his rockabilly background can be ascertained more easily in a live performance, Zoom's style of guitar playing is also indicative of this on "More Fun In The New World."

The significant thing about the album is that X combines the most attractive aspects of punk with aspects of other musical styles that make the album more accessible to those who have never been exposed to the style. For this reason, "More Fun In The New World" is an album that can be appreciated by those with a wide variety of tastes.

Comedy's unusual approach succeeds

By JOHN CREGO

A family gathering after a funeral is not usually a situation where comedy can be expected. But, in the production of Israel Horowitz's "Stage Directions," presented at Lunchbag Theatre Thursday, this was not the case.

Review

Nearly a full house at the Purple Masque Theatre greeted the three-member cast of the play, which was directed by Tamara Compton, graduate in speech. Compton handed the direction and the staging well for this slightly difficult production. The difficulty with the show was that not a word of dialogue was exchanged between any of the three performers.

As the show opened, Richard (Doug Shubert, senior in radio and television) described his feelings after attending the funeral of his parents, who were killed in a plane crash.

The character soliloquized on his thoughts and actions as he did them. He told the audience that he was picking at his underwear and scratching a week-old insect bite, then went through elaborate actions of catching a fly and smashing it between his hands.

When Richard's sister Ruby (Daria Germeroth, freshman in arts and sciences) entered, she also gave a blow-by-blow description of her actions, including adjusting her bra and blowing her nose. Then she delicately removed her nylon stockings. Ruby and her brother seemed not to get along, since they did not speak, but tossed insults at each other by telling the audience what each was thinking.

The second sister, Ruth (Katie Sinnett, junior in theater), entered the scene and took up the "self monologue," also verbalizing her thoughts and actions. Ruth had a problem with her undergarments. After Richard and Ruby made the observation that Ruth was not wearing a bra, she proved them wrong by adjusting that article of clothing.

The three actors' monologues were difficult to follow because they spoke at the same time. It was a bit confusing, to say the least.

The play ended as Ruby and Richard left Ruth alone with her sorrow. After breaking a whiskey decanter, Ruth placed its broken neck on the furniture. Then, as the lighting changed dramatically to red to symbolize her blood, she fell on the glass and took her life.

The performances given by all three were extremely well done. The comedy in the play came across even with the tough situation of dealing with the death of loved ones.

Lunchbag Theatre is a company of students who are in the Practice in Directing or Practice in Acting classes. Lighting is provided by the Lighting Class. Lunchbag Theatre is free to the public.

The next attraction will be "Total Recall," to be presented by Lunchbag Theatre at 11:30 a.m. Feb. 23 in the Purple Masque Theatre.

Musician to perform mix of reggae, rock

John Bayley, a reggae/calypso musician, will perform his original blend of reggae and rock styles at 8 p.m. today in the Union Catskeller. The concert is sponsored by Union Program Council Coffeehouse in recognition of Black History Month.

Bayley, who has been described as dynamic and unique, performs mostly original material. His repertoire includes a blend of Latin jazz, reggae, British rock and contemporary popular music.

"At his best moments, Bayley is a blend of Bob Marley and Bob Dylan," wrote Joseph Stein in Music News.

In one of his own songs, "Positively Positive", Bayley tries to relate a strong spiritual optimism without being preachy.

After playing professionally since the age of 14, Bayley, who hails from Georgetown, Guyana, went to New York on a religious scholarship in 1966 and then continued his studies at Oral Roberts University, where he became an ordained minister.

Bayley's religion is Rastafarian, which he explained is basically a Christian religion. His religious enthusiasm manifests itself, subtly, in his music.

Solo instrumentation by Bayley includes the 12- and six-string guitar, mandolin, bawouki, tambores and Latin and African percussion instruments.

He has played at many universities, often being well received. He has been the opening act for such bands as The Ohio Players, The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, Ike & Tina Turner and others.

Tickets for the concert will be on sale today from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the Union Activities Center. They also will be available at the door, which opens at 7 p.m. Ticket prices are $3 for K-State students and $4 for the general public.

card or Visa," Weishaar said.

Weishaar told the woman she worked on a consumer relations board and wanted to investigate the company, and she (the caller) could call back in a couple of days. The company never called back.

"I called the Better Business Bureau in Hollywood, Calif., where the company is based, and they said it is an ink pen promotion company and that you should exercise caution when dealing with them," Weishaar said. "There have been complaints all over the country, several with this particular company."

Hefley said giving away prizes is a common ploy of many telephone salespersons.

"The telephone schemes right now offer to sell you a large supply of some items, like vitamins or pens," Hefley said. "If you order a substantial number, they will give away a prize, usually worth a large amount of money.

"One company offered to give away a grandfather clock. Now that's usually worth about $2,000. It turned out to be laminated cardboard. People should realize that they're not going to get that kind of value in a prize," she said.

According to the U.S. Postal Service, 99.9 percent of the gifts are throw-away items, and the product value figure used is usually inflated to seven to 10 times the normal value.

Hefley said that when hotel accommodations are given away, there is usually an extra charge to hold the reservations and there are restrictions on age or marital status. Once a person gets to the hotel, he is usually made to listen to a sales pitch for some investment opportunity.

There are other drawbacks to ordering over the telephone.

If an item is purchased door-to-door, the buyer has three days to change his mind and cancel the contract. If the contract is made over the telephone, the buyer does not have that right.

The Federal Trade Commission states that the buyer must receive the package within 30 days or receive some notice of when he can reasonably expect the package.

"People will wait for several months, and they'll be writing the company and they never get anything," Hefley said. "People also tend to forget they ordered something, and it's usually quite a while before they report anything."

Many of the packages that do arrive come C.O.D. (collect on delivery), Hefley said.

"When a package comes C.O.D., you cannot examine it and then not accept it," Hefley said. "Also, when the package comes C.O.D., the postal service won't help to refund your money. In those cases, what many people do is stop payment on their checks. But if you stop payment on a check to the postmaster, that's considered fraud against the government."

"If you order merchandise over the telephone, recourse against the manufacturer is so much more difficult," Hefley said. "Before people invest over the telephone, they should check reputation of the company with local Better Business Bureau or the Consumer Board."

Health officials seek identity of widespread mystery virus

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state Department of Health and Environment is asking local health agencies in Kansas to help it identify a mystery virus which is causing high rates of school absenteeism in at least four counties of the state, a spokesman said Thursday.

Bob Moody, the department's public information officer, said state health officials are requesting that throat washings and stool specimens from those suffering from the virus be sent to the state agency's laboratory here for analysis in an attempt to identify the strain.

Symptoms include a moderately high fever of about 101 degrees, vomiting, diarrhea, sore throat, headache and loss of fluids. It generally lasts two to three days, Moody said.

Wildcat shot-putter Pinkie Suggs has her eye on the Olympic trials in hopes of finishing in the top five to qualify for the 1984 U.S. team.

Suggs anticipates Olympic trials trip

By JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

The Olympic trials in June are something that Pinkie Suggs has in the back of her mind each time she nestles the 8-pound, 13-ounce shot under the right side of her jaw and prepares for her next throw.

Suggs, sophomore in social work, said she is confident that she will be able to throw or even surpass the requirement of 52 feet that is needed to earn herself a trip to the trials.

"I'm pretty sure I'll make it to the Olympic trials," Suggs said, "but placing in the top five at the trials is what would really please me."

The closest that Suggs has come to throwing the required distance for the trials is a 51-foot mark she recorded last year when she placed eighth in the NCAA Outdoor Nationals as a freshman. For this year, Suggs' top throw was 49 feet and 7 inches — a throw enabling her to break her own school indoor record.

"It (the required distance) will come, I'm not worried about that," Suggs said. "If it doesn't come in the indoor season, then it will be in the outdoor season."

Greg Kraft, assistant track coach in charge of field events, said he is certain that Suggs has a chance to become an All-American and also win the Big Eight Conference title this year, besides going to the Olympic trials.

"I think Pinkie has progressed well over the past 1½ years that she's been at K-State," Kraft said. "She's just beginning to scratch the surface (in getting the required throw) right now — it takes time."

Kraft said Suggs is at a disadvantage in the national scene because of foreign athletes competing for American schools.

"The foreign throwers are generally more mature and have been competing longer — the longer you've competed the more strength you have," he said.

Suggs, a graduate of Manhattan High School, chose to come to K-State over other schools, including universities such as Georgia, Nebraska and Texas.

"I didn't want to be far away from home and then find out that I didn't like the school or the program," she said.

The move from high school competition to the college level has caused Suggs to change throwing techni-

Tiger coach furious with fans' behavior

By The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, Mo. — For once, it wasn't the officials that made Missouri Coach Norm Stewart mad. It was his fans.

Missouri fans began booing early in the second half of the Tigers' shocking 67-46 loss to K-State Wednesday night, the worst loss a Stewart team has ever suffered at home.

The boos were directed at center Greg Cavener, who made only two of nine shots in scoring six points. Cavener, averaging 12.3 points a game, has scored fewer than 10 points in four of his last six games.

An incensed Stewart ran to the end of the scorer's bench and grabbed what he thought was a live microphone. After discovering the microphone was dead, Stewart yelled across court at the student section, "This is the worst I have seen in 17 years."

Cavener, who passed Stewart in the game to become the No. 10 career rebounder in Missouri history with 586, took the booing in stride.

Basketball teams to battle Oklahoma 'Cats shoot for upset

The K-State men's basketball team will be hoping to gain its second consecutive upset on the road as it travels to Norman to face the 10th-ranked University of Oklahoma Sooners in a Big Eight Conference basketball contest.

The Wildcats are coming off Wednesday night's sterling performance in Columbia, where they handed the University of Missouri Tigers a 67-46 setback.

Tom Alfaro was reinserted into the starting lineup at guard position, replacing Jim Roder. The switch proved beneficial, as Alfaro scored a team-leading 14 points and Roder added 13 in his role as a substitute in the victory over the Tigers.

The victory improved the Wildcats' conference record to 2-5 and overall record to 10-10.

The Sooners also are coming off an impressive road victory after stopping the University of Nebraska 78-67 to improve their league-leading conference record to 6-1 and their overall mark to 19-3.

Wayman Tisdale, one of the top scorers in the nation, led the Sooners' charge with 33 points — the 11th time this season he has scored 30 or more points. Tisdale connected on 12 of 16 shots from the field and 9 of 11 from the charity stripe.

Women eye 16th win

The K-State women's basketball team will try to rebound from Wednesday's 66-62 road loss to the No. 12-ranked University of Missouri Lady Tigers when it travels to Norman for a Big Eight Conference encounter with the University of Oklahoma Sooners.

The loss to Missouri dropped the No. 10-ranked Lady 'Cats' overall record to 15-5 and conference mark to 5-2, which puts them into a second-place conference tie with the University of Kansas, a 72-51 winner over Oklahoma State University on Wednesday.

The Lady Tigers now are in sole possession of first place in the Big Eight with a 6-1 mark, and their overall record improved to 17-3.

Jacquetta Hurley and Lynn McCurdy lead the Sooners in scoring, averaging 17.7 and 14.8 points per Big Eight outing, respectively. Hurley is coming off a 37-point performance in OU's recent 96-85 win over the University of Nebraska.

K-State counters with Angie Bonner, Jennifer Jones, Cassandra Jones and Sheronda Jenkins, who all are averaging in double figures after the Lady Cats' seven conference contests. Bonner leads with a 13.7 average, followed by Jennifer Jones (13.0), Cassandra Jones (12.7) and Jenkins (11.2).

Suggs

ques. In high school she used the glide technique, where the athlete takes a couple of steps backwards and heaves the shot. The spin technique — rotating 1½ times and then releasing the shot — is what she and the majority of college throwers now use.

"I switched techniques because my glide wasn't giving me much improvement, so I tried the spin," Suggs said. "I continued with the spin after I hurt my leg (early in last year's season) to avoid any strain on my knee."

Kraft said last year "was a growing year" for Pinkie, since besides it being her first year at college and being injured, she had to face the pressure of being a local athlete and the tough competition in the Big Eight.

"This year she has a lot more talent, and her confidence in both school and track are improving. She's growing in all facets of her life," he said.

The only competition Suggs said she sees for herself in the upcoming Big Eight track season will come from Stine Lerdahl, a Sweden native attending the University of Kansas.

"She's really unpredictable," Suggs said. "At one meet she can throw really well, but at other meets she doesn't."

Suggs prepares herself before meets by checking on how the other competitors have been performing and just concentrating on a strong finish.

"Last year I was intimidated by a lot of the competition, but this year, I'm going to be calm, keep my technique and hopefully get a good throw off," she said.

Suggs' interest in throwing the shot began in junior high school, with a lot of influence from one of her brothers.

"My family (three brothers and two sisters) is really sports-oriented, so that helped me get involved," Suggs said.

Last year Suggs' older sister, Sandra, was a walk-on with the K-State track team, so the two competed against each other.

"She knew I could throw farther," Suggs said. "The fact that I always did better didn't bother her."

This weekend, however, Suggs will be competing against somewhat stronger competition in a five-team meet in Champaign, Ill. The teams included in the meet are the University of Illinois, the University of Missouri, Pennsylvania State University and the University of Wisconsin.

U.S. ice hockey team slips against Czechoslovakia, 4-2

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — The U.S. Olympic ice hockey team's dreams of a second straight gold medal melted away Thursday after a 4-1 loss to Czechoslovakia as the 1984 Winter Olympics yielded their first gold medals and a world record in speed skating.

The first period of the hockey game between the United States and Czechoslovakia was interrupted by a blackout with the Americans trailing 1-0. Seconds after Igor Liba scored a short-handed goal at 12:23, the lights went out above the playing surface and behind the American net. After about 10 minutes, the players were told to go to the dressing rooms and the remaining 7:37 of the period would be played when the problem was corrected.

The loss was the second straight for the Americans, who won the gold medal at the 1980 Games in Lake Placid, and virtually eliminated the team from contention for any medal.

Andropov's successor may be named today

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The Communist Party Central Committee is expected to convene a plenum today that could name a new party chief to succeed Yuri Andropov, whose body lay in state Sunday near the Kremlin as Soviets lined up for miles in 10-degree weather to pay respects.

There was no announcement by Sunday night who the new general secretary would be. Attention focused on Konstantin Chernenko, 72, the Politburo member with the most visible role during the period of mourning, as well as some of the younger members of the ruling body.

These included Grigori Romanov, 61, head of the party disciplinary body, and Mikhail Gorbachev, 52, a technocrat whose power is said to have increased significantly under Andropov.

Soviet TV did not say when the plenum would convene.

Andropov is to be buried on Tuesday, with dozens of foreign leaders attending, and, as it has been before, it seemed unlikely the party would delay proclaiming a new leader until after the funeral.

There were unconfirmed reports among Western correspondents in the Soviet capital that the plenum would be convened this morning in time for the expected afternoon arrival of most foreign dignitaries.

Japan's Kyodo News Service quoted the Soviet Ambassador to Japan, Vladimir Pavlov, as saying the meeting would be today.

Andropov, who had severe kidney disease and diabetes, died Thursday at 69, and his death was announced Friday. Mourners by the thousands lined up to pay their respects at Andropov's casket for a second day in the red- and black-draped Soviet House of Unions.

Tens of thousands of citizens were expected to view the body, in an open coffin atop a bier of flowers and medals.

Andropov's wife, Tatyana, his diplomat son, Igor, and daughter, Irina, returned for a second day to sit by the bier.

A half-mile away, official cars were parked outside the Central Committee offices. Others moved in and out of the parking lot. The activity was uncommon for a Sunday, but not surprising for a transition period. It was the only outward sign of what was certain to be intense discussion within the party's upper echelons.

The ultimate authority here rests within the ruling Politburo; the new party general secretary will be chosen from among its 12 members.

Much of the power wielded by those men is based on their support from within the policy-setting Central Committee, a body of more than 300 which ratifies any new party leader.

Chernenko, the chief party ideologist, is head of Andropov's funeral commission, a post that in the past has gone to the man who succeeded a deceased party leader. Chernenko was first in the line of Politburo members who filed past Andropov's funeral bier Saturday and offered their condolences to his family.

Since reliable information about the inner workings of the Politburo is virtually nonexistent, such outward signs are taken seriously in the Soviet Union.

Andropov was funeral commission chairman for predecessor Leonid Brezhnev. He led the Politburo in viewing Brezhnev's body about an hour before his appointment as general secretary was announced on Nov. 12, 1982.

Chernenko wields significant power in the Politburo and is believed to have sought Brezhnev's job before it was awarded to Andropov. But there were factors — including his advanced age and the rise of others within the Politburo — which left Western observers uncertain about whether Chernenko has indeed taken the top party post.

Some believed the Politburo might appoint a younger man who might hold power longer. Andropov died after 15 months in office.

Western analysts said that if Chernenko does not become general secretary, his appearance in the leading public role during the period of mourning could be explained by protocol. As party ideologist, Chernenko formally is the No. 2 man on the Politburo after the general secretary, and therefore would be a logical choice to head the funeral proceedings.

Scores of world leaders plan to attend the funeral. Japanese Foreign Minister Shintaro Abe arrived Sunday, a day before the scheduled arrival of Vice President George Bush and most other dignitaries.

The U.S. delegation also will include Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker and U.S. Ambassador Arthur Hartman.

China announced plans to send Vice Premier Wan Li, who will be the highest-ranking Chinese official to visit the Soviet Union since Premier Chou En-lai in 1964.

Syrians warn U.S. of further shelling

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Syria on Sunday warned against more U.S. bombardment of territory it controls in Lebanon. Fighting around the capital eased and medicine and food were trucked into west Beirut.

The Kuwaiti Foreign Ministry said gunmen kidnapped teen-age twin brothers described as the sons of the Kuwaiti press attache here.

Lebanese army troops and Moslem militias traded sporadic fire across the "green line" dividing Moslem west Beirut from Christian east Beirut. Police said one army soldier was killed and nine civilians were wounded — by far the lowest single-day casualty toll in the 11-day-old civil war flareup that has claimed more than 450 lives.

The state radio said U.S. Navy jets staged several reconnaissance runs over Beirut and the hills overlooking the U.S. Marine base at Beirut's airport. They drew no ground fire.

State Minister for Foreign Affairs Farouk al-Sharaa sounded Syria's warning at a news conference in Damascus, the Syrian capital, saying, "Syria has been exercising self-restraint toward shelling attacks by the U.S. 6th Fleet, particularly the (battleship) New Jersey. This cannot go on forever, and our self-restraint has limits."

He would not specify how Syria would retaliate, and denied reports of Syrian military casualties from the bombardments last week.

On Wednesday and Thursday the New Jersey and two destroyers engaged in massive shelling of Druse gun positions in the Syrian-controlled central mountains. U.S. officials blamed mountain gunners for the shelling of Beirut's Christian sector and the area around U.S. Ambassador Reginald Bartholomew's residence.

Al-Sharaa said talks between the United States and Syria, the biggest Soviet ally in the region, "is still on, but without progress." He also said the Syrian government was "talking" with the administration of Lebanese President Amin Gemayel and denied it was supporting efforts to force Gemayel from office.

Lebanese Prime Minister Shafik Wazzan and the entire Cabinet resigned a week ago, and Syria and its Moslem allies have been pressuring Gemayel to resign, as well.

Saudi mediator Rafik Hariri, who came to Beirut Saturday, talked Sunday with Gemayel and opposition leaders. The relief convoy to the Moslem sector was the first product of his efforts.

West Beirut has been cut off by the fighting, and its population has been swelled by thousands of Shiites who fled from the embattled southern suburbs and took shelter in mosques, schools, tents and unfinished apartment buildings.

The Kuwaiti Foreign Ministry said eight gunmen abducted Mahshari Yusef Hassan Badr and his twin brother, Marzouk, both students, from their west Beirut apartment late Saturday night. Local radio said they were the sons of the Kuwait press attache Yusef Mashari Badr.

The abduction took place less than a day after trial began in Kuwait for 25 people accused in the Dec. 12 bomb attacks of the U.S. Embassy and five other targets in Kuwait. Those attacks and several in Lebanon, including the Oct. 25 truck-bombing at the U.S. Marine base, are blamed on Islamic extremists loyal to Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

David Hacker, 1923 Hudson Ave., attempts to extinguish a grass fire before it reaches his house Sunday afternoon. The cause of the fire is unknown, although "there was talk of kids playing with matches," according to Hacker. The fire burned 30 acres of land.

Manhattan Mercury editor helps fight flames

Manhattan Mercury Editor David Hacker was spending a Sunday afternoon at a local racket club watching a tennis match when he received a call from his daughter informing him that fire was racing up a hill toward his home at 1923 Hudson St.

Hacker immediately rushed home to help combat the grass fire, which began about 4 p.m.

"The fire people spent a few minutes finding access (to the fire) through a fence," Hacker said. "I grabbed a garden hose and tried to keep the fire from getting closer to my house."

The fire came within about 40 feet of his house, stopping two feet short of a fence. One of his main concerns, he said, was saving some cedar trees he owns. He was successful in saving all but two.

The fire was approaching his house from the south and west, where it apparently started in an adjacent residential area, Hacker said. Rapidly shifting winds and a flammable type of grass in his yard prompted his concern.

"On my property, it burned about an acre," Hacker said. "It burned considerably more in Colony Acres."

Hacker estimated that the fire consumed about 30 acres, but said damage was limited to grass and shrubbery.

"There was talk of kids playing with matches," Hacker said of the fire's cause. "The fire department took witness reports."

A Manhattan Fire Department dispatcher said no details of the blaze could be released until this morning, and Fire Chief Bill Smith, contacted at home, said he had no information about the fire.

Carter cancels campus visit

Landon Lecture Series speaker Hodding Carter III will not visit campus today as planned due to illness.

William Richter, professor of political science and lecture series chairman, said the University received word of Carter's cancellation Saturday.

"He just was not physically able to be here," Richter said. Rescheduling of the lecture will be attempted next week.

Reagan to meet with Jordanian, Egyptian leaders

By The Associated Press

SANTA BARBARA, Calif. — President Reagan, ending a five-day vacation marred by crises, left his secluded ranch Sunday and headed back to the White House to begin a new round of Middle East diplomacy.

Presidential spokesman Larry Speakes, meanwhile, said the administration believes establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping force in Beirut is "worth looking into."

The president is meeting today with Jordan's King Hussein, followed by a separate meeting Tuesday with President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt. There also is a joint session among all three leaders planned for Tuesday. Hussein and Mubarak met Sunday night after the Jordanian ruler arrived in Washington.

Speaking to reporters aboard Air Force One, Speakes said the administration would not make a decision about supporting the concept of a U.N. force in Beirut until it was further developed.

"There have been public statements to suggest that Syria and the Soviets would be more amenable to a peacekeeping force than in the past," he said.

The presidential spokesman said the United States has had consultations on the idea with the Secretary General of the United Nations. "We would have to look at it in the context of the situation as it exists in Lebanon. It's worth exploring," he said.

On a related matter, Speakes said the United States is "just simply an observer" in the dispute about whether Lebanon should cancel its security pact with Israel, as Syria wishes.

In addition, Speakes said the president is likely to announce his timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. Marines from Beirut about mid-week.

Six days ago Reagan said he would withdraw the Marines in phases to U.S. ships off the coast of Lebanon. Although he hasn't announced his timetable, a senior administration official said the troops would be out within a month, except for perhaps 200 who would guard the U.S. Embassy.

In the middle of the week, Reagan will turn his attention to politics. He plans to attend a GOP fund-raiser in honor of suffragette Susan B. Anthony on Wednesday.

On Friday, in a continuing effort to boost his popularity with women, Reagan will hold the third in a series of White House luncheons with elected women from around the country.

The president left Washington a week ago to celebrate his 73rd birthday in his boyhood home of Dixon, Ill., and at his alma mater, Eureka College.

After stopping in Las Vegas, Nev. for a couple of speeches, the president arrived at his ranch in the Santa Ynez Mountains on Tuesday.

While Reagan vacationed, his administration was forced to deal with a deteriorating situation in Lebanon and uncertainty over relations with the Soviet Union following the death of Soviet President Yuri Andropov.

Leader's death affects few Soviets

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — "It makes no difference," the Soviet man shrugged when asked who will succeed Yuri V. Andropov as head of the Communist Party. Although thousands streamed past the leader's coffin Sunday, few seemed concerned about his replacement.

Not so for Western analysts and politicians, and presumably also for Soviet leaders holding private meetings Sunday.

But for Muscovites, it was Sunday. Some skated in brilliant winter light on flooded frozen paths in Gorky Park. Others caroused in cafes. Many shopped.

In one neighborhood bakery, in fact, shopping aroused more emotion than Andropov's passing.

For more than 20 minutes, a cashier and a clerk yelled at each other over sales procedure for the shop's prize ware — a rare kind of confectioner's cake known as bird's milk. Consumers lined up, avidly counting to see if their position in the queue would be high enough to secure one of the precious cakes.

Further down the road, an equally long line formed for potatoes. "What are you waiting for?" newcomers inquired. Not everyone standing in line knew.

Only when prompted by a Western reporter did some turn to the succession question.

Soviets learn early to divide their public and private lives. As children, they know what not to say to teachers in school — while at home, invariably, anything goes. So ingrained is the split that most Soviets see no hypocrisy in parroting official phrases when necessary and joking about it later with trusted friends.

Thus, there is a dichotomy between what Soviets tell Western reporters they think about the succession question — and what they may say in an unguarded moment.

The consensus at the beer hall Sunday seemed to be that Konstantin U. Chernenko, Leonid I. Brezhnev's closest aide and current guardian of Communist ideology, would emerge on top, if only because he is charged with responsibility for Andropov's funeral. For Soviets familiar with precedent and rules, this means he will be the next boss.

Committee chooses new veterinary dean

James R. Coffman, head of the Department of Surgery and Medicine, was named Friday as the new dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine.

"President Acker and I feel this was the best decision for the veterinary college at this time," Provost Owen Koeppe said after announcing the appointment at an assembly in Frick Auditorium.

"My major thrusts at this point are to expand the faculty and faculty support, to continue a quality teaching program and to expand in the areas of service and research," Coffman said.

Coffman was chosen from a field of six candidates by an all-faculty member committee.

His appointment is effective July 1, 1984. He is succeeding Donald Trotter. Trotter requested leave of administrative duties last summer, but will remain on the faculty for at least a year to assist in preparations for a re-accreditation visit.

Coffman had private equine practices in Oklahoma and Kansas. He also taught and did research at K-State and the University of Missouri prior to being named head of the surgery and medicine department in 1981.

Coffman will travel to Australia and New Zealand in May to deliver lectures.

He has written more than 100 publications based on his research and is the author of a text titled "Equine Clinical Chemistry and Patho-Physiology," published in 1981.

He is a past president of the American College of Veterinary Internal Medicine and is vice president of the American Association of Equine Practitioners. He is a trustee and past chairman of the University of Missouri Equine Center.

Coffman was the K-State recipient of the Norden Award for distinguished undergraduate teaching in veterinary medicine in 1969.

Congressman reschedules speech

Congressman Stephen Solarz, D-N.Y., who cancelled a K-State convocation speech last November, has rescheduled his speech for Feb. 20.

He will speak at 10:30 a.m. in McCain Auditorium, and his speech topic will be "A Look at the State of the Union." The convocation is free and open to the public.

Solarz will meet with students and others for a question and answer period at 1 p.m. in the Union Little Theater.

Solarz, one of the country's leading experts on the Middle East, has represented the 13th District in Brooklyn, N.Y., since 1974.

In Congress, Solarz serves as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, where he is chairman of the Subcommittee on Asian and Public Affairs. He also serves as a member of the Budget Committee, where he chairs the Task Force on Transportation, Capital Resources and Research Development. He is an ex-officio member of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee and a member of the House Mailing Standards Commission.

Senior receives assistantship

Marian Baker, senior in social work, has been awarded a $400 Center for Aging assistantship at K-State for the spring semester.

To be considered for an assistantship, a student must be a secondary major in gerontology and have time to work in gerontology education, research or service.

Baker has worked with developing arts and humanities programs for older adults in Riley County. She also has worked to develop a monthly calendar of events for older adults and has assisted with Senior Day. Last fall she worked on a computer mapping program of the elderly population in Kansas. She will continue this project this semester and will assist with Elderhostel.

Stock market game begins Friday

Statewide competition begins Friday for the K-State Stock Market Game.

High schools, junior high schools and elementary schools are eligible to compete, as well as individuals.

Teams and individual contestants receive an imaginary $100,000 to invest in common stock on the New York and American Stock Exchanges. Contest rules allow contestants to borrow up to an additional imaginary $100,000 on margin.

The 10-week contest runs through April 26. Teams turn in their stock selection daily to the Center for Economic Education, where contest organizers process the information and issue weekly computer reports of their stocks.

Participants get a packet of material explaining the stock market and the contest rules. The entry fee is $10 for teams, usually consisting of three to six students.

Regional and state winners will be honored at a banquet in Manhattan in May when final investment portfolios are calculated.

Faculty member joins task force

Naomi Lynn, head of the Department of Political Science, has been named to a Federal Emergency Agency (FEMA) task force to design the first national women's conference on emergency management.

FEMA is the agency charged with coordinating federal response to natural and man-made disasters and emergencies. The agency is responsible for helping state and local government to prepare for, respond to, and recover from these incidents.

Radio-TV majors make ROTC promotion film

By TERESA CAWTHON
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Air Force ROTC program will try a different method of recruitment this year.

A videotape promoting the program is being produced by Air Force ROTC and students in the radio and television option of the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications.

"In the fall of 1983 I prepared an 11-minute slide show to send out to Kansas high schools," Capt. Bronislaus Blaszkowski, assistant professor of aerospace studies, said. "In mid-January we (the K-State Air Force ROTC staff) were talking about the slide show and what we could do that was different. We came up with the idea of a similar production, but in the form of a videotape."

The videotape explains how to apply for ROTC scholarships, some advantages of the ROTC program and why current cadets chose to include ROTC in their college experience, he said. The film should be ready for distribution to Kansas high schools by the end of February.

"We want to have the videotape ready to present to a principal-teacher-counselor conference on Feb. 22," David Mettenburg, junior in mechanical engineering, said. Mettenburg is the production manager for the videotape.

The videotape is narrated by Jerry Lobb, senior in speech.

"I got the mail that all seniors get," Lobb said. "I always dreamed that I wanted to fly, so I decided to go for it. I see this film as a chance for cadets to say that we're not extraordinary for being in ROTC. It shows that we're students six days a week and one day a week we go to ROTC."

"I also see it (ROTC) as a way to get out of Kansas. I don't want to look for a job in Topeka or Kansas City. I really want to go overseas, to Germany," Lobb said. "The Air Force will give me that opportunity."

The film also will give insight about ROTC, Mettenburg said.

"I'm in charge of recruiting for ROTC here," he said. "Through this videotape, high school students can get an idea of what ROTC is from people who just made their decisions (to apply for ROTC scholarships) last year. It gives the television students experience, and it gives me experience in setting up production schedules. We have several cadets telling their views about ROTC (on the film). I think this will be an effective tool, not like some of the hokey productions I saw when I was in high school."

"If the film is good enough, Capt. B. (Blaszkowski) says he'll send it on up (through Air Force channels) to the Air Force recruiting people," Mettenburg said.

Devin Ross, freshman in nuclear engineering, said he believes it's better to go through college on an Air Force ROTC scholarship than to attend the Air Force Academy in Colorado.

"I received a Congressional appointment to the Air Force Academy, but a problem with my eyesight was going to cause a problem," Ross said. "That's when I decided to go through ROTC instead. I'm glad I came here. Here you have college life and military. The academy is strictly military. I had heard a lot of people talk about college life and how important it is. Now I know what they meant."

Ross also said he thinks the videotape will help interest high school seniors and juniors in the program.

"It takes a lot of time to do all the paperwork (for a scholarship)," he said. "We never had any kind of a presentation at Holington (where he attended high school), partly because we had a new counselor who didn't have all the sources. This videotape will help make the information available."

Iran, Iraq issue advance warning as shelling, retaliations continue

By The Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iran shelled seven Iraqi cities and towns Sunday, killing 14 people and injuring 89 others, and Iraq retaliated by attacking four Iranian areas, Iraqi officials announced.

Both Iran and Iraq had warned each other of the attacks, in some cases naming the specific city or town and warning residents to evacuate — an apparent new policy, which an Iranian official said "should be accepted by world public opinion."

The Iraqi armed forces attacked the Iranian port of Bandar Khomeini and the petrochemicals complex in the city as well as "specific targets" in the cities of Abadan, Guilan Gharb and Sar-e-Pol-e-Zahab, said a communique from the Iraqi military command.

The official Iranian news agency, Islamic Republic News Agency, said the Iraqi attacks killed at least 15 and wounded more than 120.

"We will continue to strike at these installations until they are completely destroyed," said a communique aired by Baghdad Radio.

Earlier Sunday, Iranian artillery shelling shook the Iraqi border cities and towns of Basra, Mandali, Khanaqin, Chehabi, Zorbatya, Khormal and Sayed Sadeq, the communique said.

The Iranian barrage came one day after an Iraqi attack Saturday on the southern Iranian oil city of Dezful, 50 miles east of the border. Iraq said the Dezful attack fulfilled a threat made Feb. 2 to retaliate for the Iranian shelling of Iraqi border towns.

An Iranian communique, monitored in Nicosia, Cyprus, said five people were killed and 100 injured in a missile attack on Dezful. Earlier Sunday, Iran said it bombed the Iraqi cities of Basra, Mandali and Khanaqin after warning residents to flee.

But during an interview on Tehran Radio on Sunday morning, Iranian Prime Minister Mir Hossein Musavi said, "As far as we know, the citizens (of the shelled Iraqi towns) have already evacuated them."

Of the advance warning giving by Iran, Musavi said, "This is going to be our method in the future. Our stance is quite decisive. This is a method which should be accepted by world public opinion."

An Iraqi military communique Saturday renewed calls to the Iranian population to vacate 11 target cities, including Dezful, which will be the "target of further attacks."

The Iraqi communique said the Iranian shelling of Basra killed 13 civilians and injured 85 others, including women, children and old people. In the central Iraqi border town of Mandali, almost two miles west of the Iranian border, a civilian was killed and four others were injured, the communique said.

Jordan, Egypt leaders meet prior to talks with Reagan

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Jordan's King Hussein, moderate leaders of Arab nations without diplomatic relations, met here Sunday night in advance of a round of discussions with President Reagan.

The private dinner meeting at a Washington hotel, not announced until Sunday, was seen as another step in the reinstatement of Egypt into the Arab fold.

Hussein was accompanied by Secretary of State George P. Shultz when he arrived at the Four Seasons Hotel. Shultz left about 30 minutes later, dismissing reporters' questions with a wave of his hand.

The dinner came on the eve of a scheduled meeting between Hussein and Reagan at the White House today. Reagan and Mubarak were planning to meet Tuesday, with Hussein scheduled to join later that day in three-way discussions on the Middle East and Lebanon.

An Egyptian Embassy spokesman, insisting on anonymity, said Hussein invited Mubarak to the dinner meeting.

Asked the purpose of the meeting, he said, "I think it's very difficult to say. After, we can say what was the purpose." However, there were no statements issued following the dinner.

White House press spokesman Larry Speakes said Reagan and the Arab leaders would "discuss the obvious — the current situation, how these two leaders can be helpful in resolving the immediate situation in Lebanon and how they can be helpful in moving the president's Middle East peace initiative forward."

Speakes, commenting to reporters aboard Air Force One on Reagan's return from a California vacation, said the administration's thinking "is in tandem" with that of Egypt and Jordan. He suggested Hussein and Mubarak could be helpful in persuading Syria to moderate its stand in Lebanon, where Reagan has announced most U.S. troops will be withdrawn to offshore ships.

"All the moderate Arab states have influence with Syria in a way," Speakes said.

Inspection office examines tenants' complaints

The electrical outlets in the apartment are falling out of the walls. The toilet leaks so bad that the water runs continuously. The apartment doors can be opened in seconds with a kitchen knife.

The Manhattan Code Inspection Department, located in the basement of the city administration building at 11th and Poyntz Streets, can help renters whose landlords refuse to repair such problems upon request.

"They (plaintiffs) should contact the department and fill out the information complaint form," said Dan Woellhof, head of the department.

"Then they will be asked to show the items in question, and we will have a field inspector make an inspection."

The landlord does not have to be notified of the first inspection, Woellhof said. "The tenant can give right-of-entry to his apartment. This also can include common areas such as hallways or the tenants' available laundry facilities."

If there is a violation after the first inspection is conducted, a notice and order for repairs is sent to the property owner, he said.

"Generally there is a 30-day maximum (time limit) for repairs to be made, unless it is an emergency situation," Woellhof said. If an emergency exists, there is a 24-hour time limit for making the repairs, he said.

After the designated time period is expired, the dwelling is reinspected. "Compliance is good," Woellhof said, "but the landlord has the right to appeal to the Housing and Appeals Board."

The department itself has no judicial powers to enforce compliance.

"If it comes to that method (court action), we let the (Manhattan) Municipal Court take over," Woellhof said. "We're after compliance, not taking people to court."

The Building Officials and Code Administrators' (BOCA) Basic Property Maintenance Code is used to determine compliance in Manhattan. The code is divided into five basic sections: exterior conditions, mechanical and electrical requirements, fire and safety requirements, responsibilities of persons and legal notes.

"A lot of sad things come out of this (landlord compliance), though," Woellhof said. "The complaining renter does not usually stay much longer. A landlord has made improvements, so he can raise his rent."

Acid spill causes town evacuation

By The Associated Press

CAMPO, Colo. — Crews from Dow Chemical Co. on Sunday continued cleaning up an acid spill that caused a two-hour evacuation of this little southeastern Colorado town.

The spill occurred Saturday when a truck collided with a northbound Santa Fe Railroad train, rupturing a tank car containing about 10,000 gallons of hydrochloric acid. About 2,000 gallons of the acid spilled from the tank car, officials said.

The driver of the truck, Harvey

Bush, 65, of Lovell, Wyo., was killed in the collision.

Although the collision occurred about 9:30 a.m. Saturday, officials did not begin evacuating the town's 235 residents until about noon and only as a precautionary measure, said Campo Mayor Gordon Merkley. They were allowed to return to their homes about 3 p.m. after soda ash was poured on the acid to neutralize it.

Railroad crews brought in a crane to clear the crossing Saturday afternoon. The highway was reopened at 4 p.m.

"There was a high wind blowing here from the northwest, and we have a large number of older citizens, and we felt it was best to evacuate because of the potential for lung irritation," Merkley said.

The residents were sent to a building south of town belonging to the American Agriculture Movement.

"Some of the people didn't want to leave," said Postmaster Charles Casper. "I never smelled the fumes."

Lobbying tactics determine issue

Again this year, Kansas legislators face proposals to raise the legal drinking age. While this is nothing new, 1984 may be the turning point for this type of legislation. Some believe that the side that wins this year will be the winner for quite some time.

To understand why this is so, one must look at the lobbying groups on either side of the issue. In the anti-increase corner, there is the Kansas Beer Wholesalers and Associated Students of Kansas. In the dry forces' corner, Kansans for Life at Its Best! promises to raise a hue and cry equal or surpassing that of past sessions.

The lobby the Legislature chooses to believe will determine whether the drinking age increase passes. Both are believable, with statistics to match. But the tactics each uses are as different as a cold beer next to a glass of stagnant water.

ASK and the beer wholesalers are well-financed and smooth in their lobbying. They offer educational programs. And in the past, the wholesalers have even sponsored commercials urging underage people not to drink beer. ASK especially has the right idea this year. It has invited legislators to sample non-alcoholic beverages. Smart move.

The temperance movement led by the Rev. Richard Taylor, on the other hand, employs idle threats to get its message across. Taylor is adamant in his opposition to alcohol and argues morals every chance he gets. He uses the threat of voter boycotts to sell his story. Anti-increase supporters are obviously better financed.

So, as a legislator, which side would you tend to believe? The side that promises educational programs, continued economic health for at least a fraction of the state's economy and a politically safe alternative in this issue-charged election year? Or would you opt for Taylor's side, which promises controversy, lost jobs and nothing in return for the years of tiring, empty pulpit pounding?

The choice seems clear. The best side to be on — for legislators and the public — is that of the anti-increase lobby. It offers the best hope for the future and argues with the best logic.

Keep the drinking age 18. If it is raised, Kansas will be none the better for it. If the dry forces win, that weekend six-pack would only be replaced by bottles of liquor, wine and stronger beer.

Lee White, for the editorial board

Erroneous optimism after death

Surely it would be to America's advantage if, following the death Friday of Soviet Premier Yuri V. Andropov and the appointment of his successor, a possibility for new understanding and negotiation developed.

Vice President George Bush, dispatched by President Reagan to attend the funeral in Moscow, said he believes the turnover in Soviet leadership is an opportunity to improve relations between the United States and Russia. "We view this as a turning point — a possibility to move forward — and we are going there with a very open mind," he said during a stopover at London's Heathrow Airport.

It is indeed optimistic to think the appointment of a new Soviet leader will open the avenue to improved relations with the Soviet Union. Not only do several factors indicate this is not a possibility, but Andropov died at the wrong time to afford any positive affect on American foreign policy.

First of all, Soviet leadership essentially will not change with the new leader. Basically the same people have determined Russian foreign policy for the last several years. Andropov was also ill several months before his death, requiring others to handle affairs of state. Regardless of who succeeds him, they are unlikely to differ much from Andropov in attitude and stance regarding superpower relations, nuclear disarmament and Mideastern peace.

Secondly, the timing is wrong. As Bush said, the administration is willing to take the opportunity to foster improved relations, but it is unlikely much international importance will be attached to the occasion. The Soviets know that re-election is now a determining factor in any maneuver by the president. Because they have indicated they would not like to see Reagan re-elected, it is unlikely they would sit down at the negotiations table with him now. That would only promote Reagan before a world audience as a capable leader and peacemaker.

In effect, what the administration sees as a potential watershed of political support for Reagan's re-election may be choked by Soviet craft and maneuvering.

Disclosure does not fight waste

"For Social Security and Tax Purposes — Not for Identification"

This message, found on Social Security cards, might as well fade away. It is largely ignored by many people and agencies.

If there ever was a way to identify people by numbers, the Social Security system is the way. Nine numbers, in a series of three, two and four, serve as a branding mark of American identification.

I can understand the need for some way of identifying people other than by names. How, for example, could an account for one John Smith be separated from 50,000 other John Smiths? Despite the fear of losing one's own identity to a computer number, there is a bit of logic in the Social Security identification system.

K-State uses students' Social Security numbers for student ID numbers. You do have the option of not disclosing your number. If you decide to not disclose your Social Security number, you are given a number.

Financial aid application forms also "request" your Social Security number. Again, disclosure is voluntary, but some of the forms warn that failure to voluntarily disclose the number will result in a delay in the processing of your form.

Does this sound like "voluntary disclosure?"

I've thought about not giving my Social Security number on financial aid forms, but the conformist in me always reminds me about the difficulty in receiving aid. I end up giving the blasted number.

Now comes the Board of Regents. Thursday's Collegian reported that this august body has approved a recommendation to have students voluntarily disclose their Social

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

Security numbers to the Kansas Department of Administration. This would aid the KDA in cracking down on students fraudulently collecting unemployment benefits.

Ralph Perry, University comptroller, said the request for Social Security numbers must be voluntary because of the Federal Privacy Act. The state is obligated to disclose why it wants the numbers, Perry said.

While I am for the crackdown on misuse of state funds, I have some serious doubts that this "voluntary disclosure" will work. If a person is wrongly collecting benefits, he won't voluntarily disclose any information which will allow the state to track him down. Anybody with two working brain cells can see that.

What I foresee happening is this: the state will pile up tons of information on innocent students, while finding little information on any lawbreakers.

I also can see the form. It will have some kind of warning on it about "failure to disclose this information will hinder the state's ability to collect wasted tax dollars." The forms will try to make you feel guilty about not disclosing your number, as if you were aiding a criminal.

The state must prove someone is guilty of collecting fraudulent unemployment benefits. You don't have to prove, via disclosure of your Social Security number, you are innocent.

I am glad the state is trying to chase down waste. But I don't think this disclosure policy will work.

The thing that really scares me about policies like this is that people won't think about what they are signing away. The right to privacy is one of the most important rights a human has. Everyone should understand that the more you disclose to a government agency, the more privacy you lose.

Once you lose your privacy, it is impossible to retrieve it. The government will keep a "file" on you for the rest of your life — sometimes even after your death. The more you disclose, the more potential for abuse of your "private" information will exist.

If the state wishes to chase down illegal unemployment benefits, that's its business. If it wants me to give it my Social Security number in order to do this, forget it. There are other methods available to track down abusers of governmental funds.

'Alma Mater' author made county history

Editor,
Re: Brian La Rue's column, "Finding the writer of 'Alma Mater,'" in the Feb. 8 Collegian:

We read with interest La Rue's column. We thought you might like to know that Humphrey W. Jones was a Riley Countyman. He was born in Wales Nov. 12, 1864, and moved with his family to Bala, (Riley County), Kan., in June 1870. As La Rue noted, he graduated from Kansas State Agricultural College in 1888. He then went on to graduate in 1889 from the State Normal School at Emporia (now Emporia State University).

Jones served as principal at Americus; a math teacher at Texas Normal at Denton, Texas; and superintendent of schools at Alma before becoming the supervisor of music in the Topeka public schools in 1899. In 1904, Jones became principal of the Branner School in Topeka, a post he held until his retirement in 1932. On August 13, 1932, shortly after his retirement, Jones died in Topeka.

Jones wrote the "Alma Mater" in 1903. This composition was the winning entry in a contest held by KSAC literary societies in 1902-1903. The first formal public rendition of the song was at the 1903 commencement exercises. Jones also composed many other pieces, including the Topeka High School "Alma Mater" and the song "Kansas, Sunny Kansas." The Riley County Historical Society was recently given original scores and published versions of some of Jones' compositions.

We would encourage La Rue, and any other K-State students with questions concerning Riley County subjects, to consult the Riley County Historical Museum Seaton Library, open by appointment 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday through Friday.

Advertisement reflects humanistic thinking

Editor,
Re: advertisement for Eckankar in the Feb. 9 Collegian:

A university can be described as a wellspring of knowledge, with many a thirsty mind to partake of "fresh" ideas and diverse philosophies. However, I choose to view a university as being a tree with much poisonous fruit to tempt the unwary. To say that other ideas can be dangerous makes me narrow-minded, but I am not ashamed of this.

The advertisement for Eckankar betrays this philosophy as being a form of humanism which glorifies man and eliminates his responsibility to God. A wide range of tolerance is expressed in Eckankar's acceptance of other religious perspectives and the decision not to deal with the doctrine of sin. It is unfortunate that modern churches have forgotten the Bible's warnings against double-mindedness and worthless religion. Many have slipped into what has been called "easy believism," a religion which is convenient and comfortable. The idea of "sin" has vanished, and with it, words like "self-discipline," "commitment,"

"repentance," and "sacrifice" have disappeared from their vocabulary and thinking. As Jesus said, "the gate is wide and the way is easy that leads to destruction."

Also, Eckankar claims that "it is a violation of spiritual law to attempt to influence another's way of living or thinking in any way." This statement is preposterous. The purpose of preaching, teaching, advertising, etc., is not merely to inform, but also to motivate. Eckankar has violated its own "spiritual law" by encouraging us to try it as a way of life.

Eckankar and similar humanistic philosophies have been born out of confusion. It is best to steer away from these ideas and to accept the Bible as one's guideline for life. Do not look to men, ideas, a particular church or into one's self for salvation. Only through Jesus Christ can one find true fulfillment.

Defacement degrades men

Editor,
As I walked through the Union one morning, a display of articles featuring black men caught my attention.

Being a black male myself, I thought the articles would be interesting reading. But to my surprise, someone had written their feelings about black males there. Since I am not given to profanity, I will not repeat what was written.

Not only was this act degrading, but I felt it was a slap in the face not only to myself, but to any and all who desire peace and good will toward all men.

Fellow K-Staters, let's agree on this one thing — we are here to get an education and to make it in this world, but we're not here to receive an education in racism and hinder what others can be.

South not only one 'behind'

Editor,

We have been told all our lives that the South is behind other parts of the country (North, East and West). However, we found out Monday, Feb. 6 that the Midwest is further behind than the South!

I am referring to the vandalism that was done to the display acknowledging Black History Month in the Union.

Only prior to and during the 1960s would one see such derogatory words as "nigger," "KKK," etc. in the South — not in 1984 as we see in the Midwest!

Strict policy at films needed

Editor,
Re: "UPC to implement policies regarding unruliness at films," in the Feb. 3 Collegian:

The attempt by the UPC films committee to formulate an effective policy to deal with drunks in the theater is laughable. The policy calls for ID card checks at the door, signs posted prohibiting food and alcohol in the theater, searches of people for alcohol and aisle monitors to throw out those who are observed drinking.

What makes this policy so ridiculous is that the unruly drunks are students (Who else? Outside agitators, perhaps?) who are already blasted before they arrive. People drinking in the theater isn't the problem, it's the people who yell and impress nobody with their dull wit who are responsible for the disturbance.

What is needed is a policy that calls for only one thing — throw out those who create a disturbance.

Judge refuses to reopen Craft trial

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A federal judge on Tuesday denied a request that he throw out a $325,000 jury award to former anchorwoman Christine Craft and order a new trial on her claim that she was defrauded by a television station that hired her.

"The court finds no sufficient reason to disturb the verdict," U.S. District Judge Joseph E. Stevens Jr. said.

Craft, 39, was awarded $225,000 in actual damages and $100,000 in punitive damages Jan. 13 by a jury in Joplin, Mo., that concluded Metromedia Inc., the former owner of KMBC-TV of Kansas City, had committed fraud in making certain promises when hiring her.

The trial in Joplin was ordered by Stevens last October after he threw out a $500,000 award given to Craft by a six-member federal jury in Kansas City.

Lawyers for Metromedia had asked Stevens to either reverse the jury's award or grant a third trial.

Goldwater tries to stop Murdoch

WASHINGTON — Reacting to efforts by Australian publishing magnate Rupert Murdoch to buy a major American cable television company, Sen. Barry M. Goldwater, R-Ariz., has introduced legislation to block foreign ownership of large American cable systems.

The proposal also would cover new TV networks. Australian Rupert Murdoch, who already owns the New York Post, the Chicago Sun-Times and a number of other publications in the United States, is trying to take over Warner Communications Inc.

Warner, through a joint venture known as Warner-Amex Communications, is one of the nation's largest cable operators.

Goldwater, who chairs the Senate communications subcommittee, said the rapidly expanding cable TV industry must be protected against foreign manipulation.

Caution: effects may be harmful

MERCER ISLAND, Wash. — First lady Nancy Reagan will stop at Island Park Elementary School here this week to discuss drug abuse, and the visit has one teacher worried about its after-effects.

After Mrs. Reagan's visit Tuesday, "the kids are going to come and think school is really boring," said Susan Gilson, the teacher of the drug education class that Mrs. Reagan will drop in on.

"They'll think, 'Where's Mrs. Reagan? There's just Mrs. Gilson,'" Gilson said.

Principal John Evans said he learned a month ago that the school was being considered for the visit and received confirmation Jan. 26.

Gilson said she was initially told that an "important person" would visit.

"I thought maybe it was someone in the state interested in drug education, but suddenly the Secret Service men started coming and my heart started beating," she said with a laugh. "I was in so deep I didn't know how to gracefully back out."

NASA to launch shuttle again in April

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Challenger came back to Earth after its historic Florida-to-Florida trip as the cleanest shuttle yet, and it should be back in orbit in a record 53 days for a daring satellite rescue mission, NASA officials said Sunday.

"The orbiter is very clean, in better shape than any of the others," Ken Coffey, shuttle mechanical systems officer, told reporters Sunday, a day after Challenger returned from space to the first shuttle landing at its launch site.

The only problems, he said, were a failed brake, 31 damaged thermal tiles, two hazy windows and tires scraped where they hit the concrete runway.

Commander Vance Brand had such perfect control of the ship that he hit the runway just one-half inch off the center line, Coffey said.

Coffey said he foresaw no problem preparing Challenger for its next launch date on April 4. That means it would be back in space in 53 days, a turnaround time nine days shorter than for any previous shuttle flight.

Landing the shuttle here cuts six to eight days off the launch preparation time, eliminating the need to ferry the space plane across country on the back of a Boeing 747 jetliner after touchdown at Edwards Air Force Base in California.

During the April flight, Challenger is to rendezvous with a defective $100-million scientific satellite, and a free-flying astronaut using a jet-pack is to glide over to the payload, secure it and bring it into the shuttle cargo bay for replacement of a fault-electronics box. Then it is to be returned to its own orbit to resume its interrupted study of the sun.

The defective satellite isn't one of the two communications satellites that were launched from the shuttle last week.

Astronauts Bruce McCandless and Robert Stewart proved during the just-completed mission that the gas-powered jet-pack works. They became the first humans to work in space without a safety line to the mother ship.

They and the other three crewmen, Brand, pilot Robert Gibson and mission specialist Ronald McNair, rested after their eight-day journey at their homes near their Houston training base Sunday. Today they will begin five days of debriefings, reporting on all aspects of the flight to engineers, technicians and NASA officials.

The major disappointment of the flight was the failure of two commercial communications satellites to fire into the proper orbit after the astronauts had released them properly from the cargo bay.

Coffey said Challenger's biggest problem was the failure of the right wheel's outboard brake after it had done its job during the landing Saturday. He said it would have to be replaced and that the right inboard brake will require some repairs. He said both left wheel brakes were in good condition.

There was no repeat of the small fire that flared in the auxiliary power unit compartment after the landing of the shuttle Columbia in California in December, Coffey said.

Mondale defends big labor support

Democrats trade barbs in Iowa debate

By The Associated Press

DES MOINES, Iowa — A week before Iowans begin picking delegates to the Democratic National Convention, front-runner Walter F. Mondale is nonchalant about barbs from his rivals for the party's presidential nomination.

"This is the trash period. We're getting close to these elections and people are saying things," Mondale said, exhibiting a boys-will-be-boys attitude toward the other seven major contenders.

During a 2½-hour debate Saturday, Mondale's rivals repeatedly swiped at him directly and indirectly, charging that big labor was trying to steamroll him to victory over the other candidates, that he was promising too much to too many, and that he was not candid about past positions on various issues.

Despite the attacks, Mondale was upbeat and later told about 700 union members at an AFL-CIO rally, "I'm proud of your support and no one is going to put me on a guilt trip because of it."

Meanwhile, Sen. John Glenn, No. 2 in the polls, grumbled to reporters, "I'm getting tired of this misleading of the public" by Mondale.

Although Mondale is the acknowledged front-runner going into the Feb. 20 party caucuses here — the first test of strength among Democratic rank-and-file — his support remains somewhat shallow.

Public opinion surveys say up to one-half of the Democratic voters in Iowa are undecided about who should be the party's nominee to face President Reagan in November.

And it was former Sen. George McGovern — not Mondale — who won the loudest and most sustained applause from the nearly 2,500 people who viewed the debate staged by the Des Moines Register.

"Let's assume...somebody else has this nomination locked up," he said. "We'll just say for purposes of discussion it's Fritz (Mondale)..."

"If you really believe that I'm the closest to your views on the issues before this country, you owe me that vote for this reason: it's the only way you're going to be able to send a message to whoever you think is the nominee of the direction in which you want that man to go. ...Don't throw away your conscience."

Former Florida Gov. Reubin

Askew directly accused Mondale of lobbying against consumer interests by working on behalf of a firm seeking to build a natural gas pipeline in Alaska.

Mondale sternly replied that he has "always served the public's interest."

Sen. Gary Hart used the forum to try to portray himself as offering a "break with the past."

The Rev. Jesse Jackson, who was making his first visit to Iowa, criticized delegate-selection rules that he said favor "big shots" like Mondale and work against "long shots" like himself.

Sen. Ernest Hollings said, "I don't know who's going to pay for the promises of Fritz Mondale, but I also don't know who's going to pay for the inexperience of John Glenn."

Official says Reagan policy 'a balance'

By The Associated Press

SANTA BARBARA, Calif. — President Reagan's decision to remove U.S. troops from Beirut but to escalate shelling from Navy ships was a compromise to accommodate the vastly differing views of Secretary of State George P. Shultz and Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger, a White House official says.

"The policy is a balance between the two views, but also a balance that everybody agrees to — that is, you continue to support a U.S. diplomatic position in the Middle East, at the same time according more protection to the Marines," said the official, insisting on anonymity.

Weinberger, and reportedly the Joint Chiefs of Staff, were known to believe that the 1,500 Marines in Beirut as part of a multinational force were extremely vulnerable and were serving no useful military purpose.

But, Shultz reportedly disagreed strongly with attempts within the administration to withdraw the Marines since he believed their presence was vital to supporting the shaky Lebanese government of Amin Gemayel.

Reagan's new policy, announced six days ago, in effect satisfied the concerns of both men.

Reagan, meanwhile, ended a five-day vacation near Santa Barbara on Sunday and flew back to the White House after a week marked by widespread confusion about his plan's details. There was confusion about when Reagan made a decision to withdraw the Marines, when their withdrawal would occur, and the administration's rationale for the shelling.

Asked about this seeming confusion within the administration, the official said there was no concern inside the White House about the appearance of disarray.

"Our policy hasn't changed, but the implementation of it has to vary from time to time to meet changing circumstances," he said. "And I think that is not a negative, but a positive."

Several high-level administration officials disagreed publicly with deputy White House press secretary Larry Speakes' statement that Reagan made the decision in principle Feb. 1 to withdraw the Marines. Weinberger told the House Foreign Affairs Committee on Thursday, "The decision was made much later."

Gen. John W. Vessey, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who was with Weinberger at the time, said: "If the decision was made on the first of February, you and I have spent an awful lot of time in meetings the last week to no avail."

The defense secretary was so upset by the incident that he reportedly wrote a letter to the White House saying that Speakes was inaccurate and should be better informed.

Despite these questions, the White House official insisted Reagan signed a directive Feb. 1 that contained the policy change. This official said he had seen the paper.

Although Reagan didn't specify the timetable for troop withdrawal in his announcement, subsequent estimates from administration officials ranged from a few days to three or four months.

The most recent estimate, according to another administration official, is that all but a force of 200 assigned to guard the U.S. embassy in Beirut will be out within a month.

But the initial uncertainty angered several congressmen, including Republicans, who said they got the impression from Reagan's announcement that the withdrawal would be imminent.

The White House official said the confusion stemmed from the fact that the conditions in Lebanon had changed dramatically from the time the withdrawal was under initial consideration until it was announced.

Originally, he said, the withdrawal might have taken three or four months, but once the Lebanese cabinet resigned and the situation there began to deteriorate rapidly, the timetable was moved up.

Bank displays prints by department head

Europe, the Middle East and Manhattan all have something in common — prints and drawings by Charles Stroh.

Stroh, head of the Department of Art, is opening an exhibition today at the Union National Bank, 727 Poyntz St. The display will continue for three weeks, through March 2.

"I always thought I was going to be an artist," Stroh said.

Stroh said he has enjoyed drawing since childhood. After serving two years in the Peace Corps, he taught art for three years in public schools and 12 years at the university level.

Manhattan is behind Europe and the Middle East in that this is Stroh's first exhibit here. Stroh said he has displayed his work in 50 or 60 shows in approximately 15 states. Virginia, Wisconsin, Michigan and Iowa — states he has taught in — retained various pieces of his work, and he left with a little profit.

He estimated that 30 or 35 of his prints and drawings have been sold to private collectors. Prints, like the ones in the local exhibit, sell for $75 to $175, while drawings sell for $150 to $400. Prices are misleading, Stroh said, because the gallery usually gets half the profit. So a $100 drawing actually sells for $200.

Drawings are higher priced because there is only one original, Stroh said, adding that his drawings are done in graphite or charcoal and take 25 to 30 hours to complete. Prints, on the other hand, take months to complete, he said.

Lithography is a type of printing Stroh uses. A lithograph is printed with ink and a smooth surface, like limestone, that holds the ink for a number of prints. Stroh said he can make between 10 and 20 prints before regaining (putting on more color or ink) the limestone.

The works being shown were produced during the last eight years. Stroh said they can be grouped into portraits and landscapes. Lithographs can be seen in a group of non-figurative prints.

Stroh said he sees art as his job, just as a biologist views biology as a job. His ideas come from many different places such as readings, things he sees, his feelings and other artists' work.

"It's a self-analysis," he said. "You say things about yourself in your work."

Stroh said his biggest disappointment is the lack of places for any artist to show his work in Manhattan.

"It's a crying shame. This (Union National Bank) is the only place to show work," he said.

Recreational complex welcomes millionth user

More than 1 million served.

This is not only the claim of a fast-food restaurant, but also of Recreational Services.

The one millionth user walked through the door of the L.P. Washburn Recreation Complex Saturday night within 15 minutes of closing time.

Russell Fugate, freshman in physical education, was showered with kisses, had his picture taken and received a T-shirt acknowledging his feat.

"We were sweating it out," said Tony Andrade, senior in physical education and building manager.

When the complex was 10 people short of one million users at 9:30 p.m. Saturday, Recreational Services employees said they thought the person wouldn't come until Sunday.

The Rec Complex has been open to students since Oct. 3, 1980.

Before that date, Recreational Services was located in Ahearn Field House, sharing the facilities with classes of the Department of Physical Education, Dance and Leisure Studies.

"When we were at Ahearn, it was difficult to keep count (of the number of users)," Joyce Halverson, assistant director of Recreational Services, said. "This complex accommodates so many more students, and there are no time restrictions like there was at Ahearn."

Halverson said the complex is used equally by men and women. She estimates nearly 80 percent of K-State students have used the Rec Complex.

"People are becoming a bit more aware of fitness and wellness," Halverson said. Other reasons for the success are its availability and the fact that the programs are pre-paid. Recreational Services receives $12 from each student's fees each semester.

Last month was the most popular month on record. In January, 50,539 people used the facilities. Students accounted for 87 percent of this total, or 43,744.

Customs agents infiltrate group smuggling technology to China

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Five people, including three Chinese-born U.S. citizens, have been arrested for allegedly trying to ship equipment that could be used in missile guidance to the People's Republic of China, U.S. Customs officials announced Sunday.

Saturday's arrests came after a three-month "sting" in which an undercover agent posing as a technology broker met with the five, four men and a woman, on several occasions, said Arthur Stiffel, U.S. Customs special agent in charge for New Jersey.

But before the ring was infiltrated, authorities believe it successfully shipped to China about $1 million worth of "computer chip devices" that can have military uses, according to Stiffel.

He would not elaborate on possible uses of the equipment that reached China, citing security reasons. He said he had no indication any of the five were Chinese government agents, "but that aspect will be investigated."

The investigation was the first involving China, said Patrick O'Brien, an assistant Customs commissioner in New York. The arrests were part of "Operation Exodus," a two-year effort by Customs to stop high technology equipment from reaching nations where it might be used against the United States.

In the undercover operation, the "broker" arranged to sell 100 transverse wave tube amplifiers to the five for $12,500 each. The devices, which have military uses only, were to be shipped to a front firm in Hong Kong, then moved into China, Stiffel said.

The agent got two of the suspects, who are Hong Kong residents, to come to the United States last week by promising to get them other equipment. "A conspiracy was finalized in which they gave us a specific order and specific arrangements for payment and a shipping route," Stiffel said.

Meetings at various locations in Marlboro, N.J., were secretly videotaped, Stiffel said, and agents arrested the five at 6:30 p.m. Saturday as they entered a car in Marlboro after a final meeting.

All face charges of conspiracy and violation of the Arms Control Export Act, and could be sentenced to seven years in prison upon conviction, he said.

In addition to previous shipments, "they were in the process of obtaining some mini-calculators and computers with military applications when we apprehended them," Stiffel said. "They gave us a shopping list of 14 high-tech items that they wanted our undercover to acquire for them."

Survey shows factors of education

By The College Press Service

WASHINGTON, D.C. — About the same percentage of America's high school graduates went on to seek some sort of college education in 1980, but for the first time more women than men continued their educations.

Moreover, a student's race, socioeconomic background and geographic location seem to play a role in deciding if the student will go on to college after high school and if the student goes to a two-year or four-year school, the National Center for Education Statistics (NCES) said in a recent survey.

Over half the nation's high school seniors of 1980 went straight to college, NCES' annual "High School and Beyond" survey found.

The enrollment rate was not unexpected.

"The overall percentage (of students going on to college) has been fairly constant in recent years," Tom Snyder, NCES' education program specialist, said.

"Through most of the seventies, the rate has hovered around 50 percent, except for during the Vietnam era, when it was up somewhat," Snyder said.

Even more 1980 high school graduates continued their educations in the three years since they graduated, the report said.

Besides the initial 54 percent who immediately enrolled in post-secondary schools, an additional 14 percent attended some form of post-secondary institution in the three years after they graduated.

The high school class of 1980 also marked the first time since World War II that more women than men went on to college.

By fall, 1980, 33 percent of the women had enrolled in four-year colleges and 19 percent went to two-year schools. Men's attendance rates were 30 percent and 19 percent, respectively.

Asian Americans had the highest college attendance rate of all racial and ethnic groups, the study states.

Seventy-four percent of all Asian-American high school graduates went on to attend some form of college, compared to 51 percent for whites, 44 percent for blacks, 43 percent for Hispanics and 34 percent for American Indians.

Of the students who scored high in academic ability tests in high school, nearly 80 percent went directly to college.

Sixty-four percent attended four-year colleges in fall 1980. Only 15 percent went to two-year colleges.

Among "average" students, 51 percent went on to college. Just over 21 percent of the "low ability" students opted for some form of post-secondary education.

While race and academic ability played important roles in determining if students went to college, socioeconomic factors appear to have played a big role in determining what kinds of schools they chose.

Fifty-five percent of the students from high socio-economic families went to four-year colleges, compared to 30 percent of the middle-income students and 17 percent of the low socio-economic graduates.

Geography also played an important role in choosing between two-year and four-year colleges, the study said.

In the Northeast, 36 percent of the students went on to four-year colleges, while 14 percent chose two-year schools. Students in most other regions chose four-year and two-year institutions in the same percentages, except in the West. There, 28 percent of the students went to two-year colleges and only 22 percent to four-year campuses.

The discrepancy reflects "a different pattern of state emphasis on two-year colleges in the West, particularly in California," Snyder said.

National Guard practices techniques in KC

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Armed with state-of-the-art weapons, more than 100 members of the Kansas National Guard on Sunday practiced battle techniques on an urban combat course through a section of Kansas City, Kan.

The 2nd Mechanized Battalion-137th Infantry unit, based in Kansas City, Kan., was believed to have been the first National Guard unit to try the special urban combat training.

The new training exercise, called End Of Phase Training, rated the guardsmen's combat and survival skills in 22 tests involving enemy soldiers, tanks, land mines and nuclear bombs.

Capt. Craig Crane, a spokesman for the guard unit, said the exercise was conducted over a 3½-mile course that included residential areas, city parks and land owned by the National Guard.

Chief justice urges major legal system reforms

By The Associated Press

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — America's legal system, mesmerized by the thrill of courtroom battles, has grown "too costly, too painful, too destructive, too inefficient for a truly civilized people," Chief Justice Warren E. Burger said Sunday.

"Trials by the adversarial contest must in time go the way of the ancient trial by battle and blood," Burger said in a speech prepared for a meeting of the American Bar Association. He urged the nation's lawyers to lead a search for reforms.

In a speech that also attacked some forms of lawyer advertising and frivolous lawsuits, he said the legal profession has lost the public's confidence by sticking to its adversarial tradition:

"The entire legal profession — lawyers, judges, law teachers — have become so mesmerized with the stimulation of the courtroom contest that we tend to forget that we ought to be healers of conflict."

"When we see costs of justice rising, when we see our standing in public esteem falling, something is wrong," he said.

He proposed an ABA-sponsored study, with non-lawyers participating, to recommend major changes in the nation's legal system.

"Doctors, in spite of astronomical medical costs, still retain a high degree of public confidence because they are perceived as healers," he said. "Should lawyers not be healers? Healers, not warriors? Healers, not procurers? Healers, not hired guns?"

In his annual address to the ABA's winter convention, he repeated themes of lawyer competence and conduct that have marked his 15 years as chief justice. He touched off a furor in 1977 by saying half the nation's lawyers may not be qualified to represent clients in court.

During a speech in London last summer he said the United States desperately needs lawyers and law professors "who understand that access to justice does not invariably mean access to courtrooms."

On Sunday, Burger at times was conciliatory, telling lawyers they have made big contributions to America and improved law practice.

But, he said, the profession has a long way to go. He blamed the decline in public trust in lawyers on the increase in their numbers, the willingness of some to advertise like used car dealers and the absence of consistent disciplining of unethical attorneys.

He also ripped "absurd lawsuits" that only promote fat legal fees. Burger said the proliferation in lawyers is one of the problems.

There are more than 600,000 lawyers in the country today, with 35,000 new lawyers joining their ranks each year. More than 300,000 lawyers are ABA members. Despite what should be increased competition, the cost of hiring a lawyer is going up, he said.

The law profession could suffer the same decline that hit the U.S. auto industry "when the quality and price of the automobiles made in this country were found unacceptable," Burger said.

ABA President Wallace Riley said he did not think the remarks were particularly harsh. He also said the ABA has been examining most of Burger's concerns and expressed doubts over the need for a new study.

"It was a twinging of the conscience," Riley said.

"Paraguay... the country and its people with emphasis on education."

Philadelphian dockworkers shun 'final offer' by shippers

By The Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — Bargainers in the Philadelphia dockworkers reached no agreement in talks Sunday but planned to meet again today, while negotiators in Boston prepared to go back to the table later this week.

In Baltimore, also snarled by longshoremen's walkouts that began Thursday, another vote was planned on a contract already rejected.

A new agreement was ratified Saturday by International Longshoremen's Association locals in New Orleans, where dockworkers had stayed on the job despite the contract dispute.

Most of the 50,000 members of the ILA in 36 Atlantic and Gulf coast cities accepted new three-year pacts with shippers last week.

But issues of guaranteed pay, working in the rain and seniority delayed settlements in five ports, where dockworkers struck when contract extensions expired.

Talks in Philadelphia broke off after about seven hours, said a spokesman at the office of the Philadelphia Marine Transport Association. Negotiators agreed to meet again at 10 a.m. today.

There was no comment from union officials on the talks.

Eight Philadelphia locals of the ILA, representing 2,500 workers, struck after union members overwhelmingly rejected a contract proposal termed a "final offer" by the PMTA, which represents shippers and terminal owners in the Philadelphia area.

Strikers are refusing to handle all cargo except perishables, mail and government supplies. Before the first day of talks broke off Saturday, Mayor W. Wilson Goode promised to intercede if the walkout threatens the city's economy.

The talks have centered on the guaranteed income program, which assures workers of being paid for a minimum of 1,900 hours per year regardless of how much they work. The PMTA wants to scale back the program further than the locals have said they will allow.

In Boston, talks are set to resume Tuesday.

Also at issue in Boston is the guaranteed annual wage system, which has been set at 1,800 hours yearly at $15 an hour. Shippers want to cut it back to 1,500 hours because business has fallen off, they said.

Some 3,000 striking Baltimore dockworkers will vote again this week on a contract they had rejected, said John Kopp, ILA vice president. The issue there is a clause requiring workers to work in the rain.

Dockworkers in Providence, R.I., ratified a new contract Friday. Under the new agreement, wages would rise $1 an hour in each of the next three years. Basic wages previously were $15 an hour.

Reggae musician captivates crowd with contagious beat, enthusiasm

The crowd in the Catskeller was moved to its feet Friday night halfway through the performance of reggae/calypso artist John Bayley when he hammered out a powerful rendition of the Beatles' "Ob-La-Di Ob-La-Da".

Review

Throughout the concert, Bayley's fast and heavy strums on his acoustic guitar and his skin-tingling voice were a captivating combination, especially during one of his own songs, "Positively Positive." In the song he described his enthusiasm about living, which motivated some of the crowd to the dance floor. The floor was full of dancers until the end of the show.

Like Jimmy Buffet, he told stories between songs and joked with the crowd.

Bayley made crowd members active participants in the two-hour show. Most of the people in the Catskeller responded with hand clapping, foot stomping and vocal praise as the man clad in tight black pants and braided hair hopped around on the stage, guitar in hand. One person did hand springs in front of the stage.

In another of his songs, "Men Are Smart, But Women Are Smarter," he presented a contagious rhythm, to which the audience clapped its hands.

Bayley, a single performer who also plays the bouzouki, appears to have a positive stage presence similar to that of the late Bob Marley, one of his favorite musicians.

Bayley travels with no back-up band, and he said that the tambourines on his ankles were his rhythm section. The tambourines clanked harmoniously with the strum of the guitar as he vigorously stomped his feet.

During the concert he encouraged the audience to have fun.

"You look like a wild, crazy bunch. Let's have a party here. You need to have fun in life," he said. The audience complied.

Bayley is a practitioner of the Rastafarian religion, which he said is basically a Christian religion.

"Rastafarian is a lifestyle based on the belief that if you generate love and goodness, it will be reflected back to you," he said in an interview after the concert.

Bayley has recorded two regional albums.

"I'm recording an album now. It will be a major release and it should be coming out this spring," he said.

He currently lives in the mountains of Colorado.

"You have to live someplace where you can relax when you're in this business," he said.

Firms to hire technical graduates

By The College Press Service

PRINCETON, N.J. — The job outlook for engineering and other technical majors appears to be "much more optimistic" than just a few months ago, a newly-released study of recruiting trends states.

"Last year people were much more cautious," said Rea Christofferson, spokesman for Peterson's Guides, which just completed its survey of engineering, science and computer jobs for 1984.

Engineering job offers, once the fastest-growing and most highly paid of all job fields, dropped a whopping 50 percent last spring, the Scientific Manpower Commission said.

The decline was due primarily to the recession and because new graduates were taking the first offers they got instead of waiting for better offers to come along, analysts said.

Things look more promising for this spring's technical graduates, however.

Of the 334 firms responding to Peterson's survey, 31 percent plan to hire more graduates in 1984 than in the previous year.

A year ago, only 24 percent of the respondents planned an increase in hiring.

But competition is likely to be keen, Christofferson said. Seventy-two percent of the employers surveyed this year have tightened requirements for new employees.

More than half intend to make fewer campus visits, and 34 percent say they won't make as many job offers to this year's graduates.

Moreover, 23 percent don't plan to increase starting salaries for the class of 1984, and 27 percent have set higher standards for job candidates, the survey reveals.

Of the 66 disciplines surveyed, planetary and space science majors are the least-requested graduates by employers, followed by textile engineering, astronomy and technology and public policy majors.

and warnings for parts of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

The most serious damage was outside the rural south-central Louisiana town of Arnaudville, where one house was reported destroyed, a mobile home overturned and three people were injured.

Marble-size hail and heavy rain also struck Louisiana, with 3 to 5 inches of rain flooding low-lying roads. Shreveport got 3.48 inches in six hours and Fort Polk got 4.35 inches in 24 hours. The rain spread to western Mississippi, with 2.25 inches reported at Anguilla.

Flash flood watches were issued for southeastern Arkansas, much of northern and western Louisiana and southeastern Texas, where Burkeville got 6.32 inches of rain during the night. Roads were reported flooded in Jasper County, Texas.

Tornadoes strike Midwest; warm winter spell continues

By The Associated Press

The first tornadoes of the season hit parts of Texas, Kansas and Louisiana and waves of strong thunderstorms dumped up to a half-foot of rain on the lower Mississippi Valley on Sunday, while an unusual mid-winter warm spell melted snow as far north as Upper Michigan.

Dense fog covered the Eastern Seaboard and parts of the Midwest, with Maryland draped by a layer 1,000 feet deep. Since the middle of last week, fog has contributed to at least 6 deaths. Heavy snow from a storm on Saturday still blocked some highways in eastern Colorado.

The National Weather Service reported many tornado sightings and high wind Sunday around Louisiana, causing scattered damage to rural buildings and downed trees. The agency issued tornado watches

The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of the high schools listed below to attend the 1984 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with their former students about the student's preparation for and experiences in KSU academic programs, the student's feelings as to how the high school curriculum could be improved, and the student's concerns about their adjustment from high school to university life.

Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school, while gaining valuable information about making your KSU experience a more meaningful one for you. It is also an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates.

Students attending are welcome to drop by the location below anytime between 10:15 a.m. and 12:15 p.m. on February 22. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

Women down OU to grab 71-62 win

Twenty points by sophomore Jennifer Jones and a 27-of-31 free throw performance led the K-State Lady 'Cats basketball squad to a 71-62 win over the University of Oklahoma Sooners Saturday at Norman.

K-State connected on 87.1 percent of its free throws — including 16 of 18 in the second half — to overcome a 31-29 Sooner lead at halftime. The Lady 'Cats were hitting 62.4 percent of their free throws prior to the contest.

K-State improves to a 16-5 overall record and 6-2 in Big Eight Conference play. Oklahoma falls to 16-5 and 4-4 in the conference.

Senior Angie Bonner scored six quick points in helping the Lady 'Cats jump to an early 14-6 lead. Oklahoma fought back, however, outscoring K-State 22-8 to take a 28-22 lead with 2:58 remaining in the half.

Three free throws by sophomore Cassandra Jones and a 12-foot jumper by Jennifer Jones, with three seconds left in the half, cut the OU lead to two points. The Sooners closed out the first half of play with a 31-29 advantage.

It was a poor first half field goal showing for K-State — hitting only nine of 25 shots for 36 percent — but an impressive display from the free-throw line, where the Lady 'Cats made 11 of 13 shots. Jennifer Jones scored 10 of her game-high 20 points and grabbed seven rebounds in the first half.

Bonner scored 10 points during the first six minutes of the second half to help K-State take a 45-42 lead. The Lady 'Cats never trailed again and led by as many as 12 points before closing out the nine-point victory.

Jennifer Jones, who fouled out with 1:49 remaining, led K-State with 20 points and nine rebounds. Bonner tossed in 17, Cassandra Jones added 13 and Sheronda Jenkins contributed 10 to round out the double-figure scoring for K-State.

Jacquetta Hurley and Lynn McCurdy led the Sooner attack, canning 18 and 16 points, respectively. Shirley Fisher added 15.

K-State tied the Sooners in the rebounding battle, each pulling down 37 caroms. OU hit only 35.6 percent from the field, while the Lady 'Cats made 44.9 percent, including 13 of 24 attempts during the second half of play.

K-State next returns home for two consecutive contests in Ahearn Field House, playing host to the University of Colorado on Thursday and Oklahoma State University on Saturday.

Swedish speed skater nabs Olympic gold for homeland

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — Tomas Gustafson of Sweden narrowly won the men's 5,000-meter speed skating race, giving his country its first gold medal at the XIV Winter Olympics here Sunday.

The 24-year-old Swede clocked seven minutes, 12.28 seconds, two one-hundredths of a second faster than Igor Malkov of the Soviet Union, who took the silver with 7:12.30. The bronze medal went to Rene Schoeisch of East Germany in 7:17.49.

Gustafson trained with U.S. skaters, including Eric Heiden, during summers the late 70s and early 80s at their rink in Madison, Wis. On Sunday he failed to break the Olympic record of 7:02.29 that Heiden set in the 5,000 meter en route to five gold medals at the 1980 Lake Placid Games.

The U.S. skaters never came close to the medal places in this Olympic.

Michael Woods from Wauwatosa, Wis., at 31 years the veteran of the U.S. squad, finished 12th with a time of 7:24.81. "Third in the age list, 12th in the race. That's not really bad," he said after the race. "I hope to do better in the 10,000 (on Saturday)."

Commenting on the failure of the American team to win any speed skating medals in the two men's and one women's events thus far, Woods said, "The games are not over yet."

He called the narrow decision between Gustafson and Malkov "a tie for that distance."

Gustafson said he had a feeling he could win prior to the race. "But it was very hard to skate" on the ice here, he said.

Other U.S. finishers were Mark Mitchell from Minnetonka, Minn., in 21st place clocking 7:34.32 and Mark Huck of Chicago in 35th in 7:46.91.

Skating pair snares first U.S. medal

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — Kitty and Peter Carruthers, brother and sister, ended the medals famine for the U.S. Olympic team Sunday, taking the silver in pairs figure skating with a nearly flawless performance.

The couple skated the 4½-minute freestyle program masterfully, and were beaten out only by Soviets Elena Valova and Oleg Vasiliev, who received one 5.9, six 5.8s, two 5.7s.

The Carrutherses, both adopted when they were 3 months old, received one score of 5.9 from the Canadian judge, but a 5.5 from a Japanese judge. They also got one 5.8 and six 5.7s.

"I'm in shock. I've never been happier in my whole life," Kitty said. "I knew right before the start. I looked at Pete. It was going to be magic."

They were few detectable problems in their presentation, while the gold medalists had one detectable flaw, a slip by Valova on a double axie.

The Carrutherses edged another Soviet couple, Larissa Selezneva and Oleg Makarov for second place. The two pairs had been tied for second going into the freestyle part of the competition, which counted for 80 per cent of the final score.

No American has ever won a gold medal in the pairs skating competition. The Carrutherses had said that they just wanted to skate a clean program and not worry about judging or winning, and they did just that.

Both were dressed in black, their necklines ringed with rhinestones, and they were a smooth-skating pair. At the end of their program, knowing they had done well, they hugged in joy in the center of the Zetra rink.

"I told him I loved him and I was happy we worked this hard and we achieved our goal," Kitty said. "It's a dream come true."

"We fight like brother and sister and we care for each other like brother and sister," Peter said.

Sooners bounce 'Cats for 20th victory, 80-74

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

The Oklahoma Sooners are often called a one-man team, that man being All-American center Wayman Tisdale. But in Saturday's 80-74 win over K-State in Norman, Tisdale's teammates proved they can win without him.

Plagued by foul trouble, Tisdale played only 22 minutes before fouling out in the final minutes after scoring 19 points. But the rest of the Sooner team, led by sophomore guard Shawn Clark's 20 points, filled the void left by Tisdale's absence to hold off the 'Cats.

The Sooners showed balanced scoring with a total of five players scoring in double figures. Besides Tisdale and Clark, Calvin Pierce and Darryl Kennedy scored 12 points each, while David Johnson added 11.

Despite that balance, Sooner Coach Billy Tubbs said he was unhappy with his team's play.

"If we couldn't get beat tonight, we may not get beat at all," he said. "We played poorly. We just went through the motions."

With the loss, K-State's frustration against the Sooners continued. Oklahoma's six straight wins over the 'Cats have given the Sooners an edge in the series between the two schools, one of only two Big Eight Conference teams which K-State trails. (The other is the University of Kansas).

The Sooners moved their record to 20-3 with the win, Oklahoma's third straight 20-win season under Tubbs. The team also strengthened its hold on first place in the Big Eight with a 7-1 mark. K-State dipped below .500 at 10-11, 2-6 in the conference.

While the Sooners have dominated K-State in recent years, most games have been decided in the final seconds. Thanks to an 18-point second-half scoring explosion by K-State junior Tom Alfaro, Saturday's contest was no exception.

The 'Cats dug themselves a hole early, falling behind the high-scoring Sooners 6-0 in the games opening minutes. After a slow start, K-State fell behind the Sooners 29-13 with 9:31 remaining, due to 38 percent shooting and eight turnovers in the first half.

The 'Cats situation appeared to brighten with 5:29 left, when Tisdale sat down with his third personal foul. However, K-State could only get within nine points of the Sooners before Oklahoma again opened a 15-point advantage, 42-27, at half time.

K-State ended any Sooner thoughts of a runaway victory, outscoring Oklahoma 13-2 in the first four minutes of the second half. Alfaro led the run, hitting six of his career-high 26 points.

"We competed in the second half, but we didn't compete in the first half," K-State Coach Jack Hartman said. "We were aggressive and we attacked the basket (during the second half)."

Tisdale began to ignite the Sooners with two baskets inside, but picked up his fourth foul with 15:00 remaining. With Tisdale on the bench, the 6-foot-8 Johnson took over, scoring two quick baskets as the Sooners came alive, opening a 12-point advantage, 54-42.

In the game's last two minutes, K-State made it close. After Tisdale picked up his fifth foul, junior forward Eddie Elder sank two free throws to cut the Sooner margin to seven, 75-68. A Clark miss on the front-end of a one-and-one gave the 'Cats another chance to cut the margin. A layup by sophomore Tyrone Jackson brought K-State to within five points with a minute left. Elder then sank two more charities, after Oklahoma missed another free throw opportunity, to cut the Sooner lead to three, 75-72.

Oklahoma's Clark and Jan Pannell hit five of six charities to ice the Sooner win. A shot by junior Eric Watson cut the Sooners' lead to six as time ran out.

K-State had three players in double figures. Following Alfaro's 26 points, Elder scored 17 and Lafayette Watkins chipped in 12.

Arkansas shocks North Carolina; Balentine basket upsets Tar Heels

By The Associated Press

PINE BLUFF, Ark. — Charles Balentine swished a five-foot baseline jumper with four seconds remaining as unranked Arkansas upset No. 1 North Carolina 65-64 Sunday.

The loss was the first for the Tar Heels, the last unbeaten Division I basketball team, after 21 victories, their longest winning streak since their 32-0 NCAA championship season of 1957.

Arkansas, 19-4, led by four points at the half and by as much as eight in the second half.

North Carolina had gone ahead 64-63, its only lead of the second half, on a 10-foot jump shot by Michael Jordan with 1:13 remaining.

Arkansas called time with 29 seconds left and Alvin Robertson drove for the basket as the clock wound down. When he went up to shoot, he was closely guarded and dumped the ball to Balentine for the game winner over Tar Heel forward Sam Perkins.

A long jump shot by Carolina's Steve Hale bounced off the rim at the buzzer.

Slightly more than two minutes earlier, Balentine made both ends of a one-and-one free throw situation to give Arkansas 63-60 lead. Jordan responded with a 17-footer that cut the margin to one.

Center Joe Kleine led Arkansas with 20 points, while Darryl Bedford added 12, Leroy Sutton 11 and Balentine 10.

Jordan topped all scorers with 21 points for North Carolina, followed by Perkins with 17 and Hale with 15.

North Carolina led by as much as five early and Arkansas took the lead for the first time 10-9 on Kleine's two free throws with 15:49 left in the first half.

A follow shot by Robertson and a tip-in by Kleine put Arkansas on top 19-15 before Jordan got loose inside. Arkansas led 24-19 when Kleine made two free throws with 7:54 left, but North Carolina ran off eight straight points — two baskets by Perkins wrapped around two baskets by Hale. The Razorbacks then outscored the Tar Heels 12-2 over the next three minutes. Bedford came off the bench and drove the baseline for a basket, got a good bounce on a short jumper and then swished a 5-footer to make it 30-29.

A short turnaround jumper by Kleine, a drive by Norton after a steal by Balentine and two free throws by Kleine made it 36-29 with 2:53 left.

Hale's three-point play and two free throws by Perkins narrowed the margin to two, but Sutton got inside for a pass from Robertson and a four-point halftime lead.

Connors retains indoor title

By The Associated Press

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — Top-seeded Jimmy Connors kept his U.S. National Indoor Tennis Championship title Sunday with a 6-3, 4-6, 7-5 victory over France's Henri LeConte at The Racquet Club of Memphis.

Connors boosted his number of indoor titles to a record seven when LeConte doubled faulted at match point.

The victory, his first since September's U.S. Open and his 101st singles title, was worth $45,000. LeConte, seeded 16th, won $22,500.

Connors was masterful in serves, losing only three points in the first set, six in the second and five in the third.

LeConte, who served up eight aces and eight double faults during the match, was broken twice in the opening set but came back to level the title match 1-1. He broke Connors in the ninth game with an unreturnable backhand and holding his service in the 10th game.

Connors, 31, held serve in the first game of the final set, going up 30-0 and then being awarded a penalty point and a game point when LeConte, 20, collapsed on the court.

LeConte held his service in the second game and Connors saved a break point in the third game.

LeConte, ranked 29th by the ATP computer, pulled even with the world's No. 3 player at 30-30 with a service winner.

LeConte followed his next serve to the net and, with Connors out of position on the baseline, punched a volley past the baseline to set up match point.

After serving long, LeConte netted his second serve to hand Connors the championship.

Fed up with sports' clowns

I consider myself more of a sports fan than most, but sometimes I just get fed up with all the lawsuits, counter-suits, counter-counter suits and protests that go on and the clowns who are in the middle of them.

One guy I'm fed up with is Mike Rozier, the ex-Nebraska Cornhuskers running back, now a member of the USFL's Pittsburgh Maulers. Mike has shown a lot of class since Nebraska's nose-dive in the Orange Bowl. He involved the university in an National Collegiate Athletic Association investigation concerning alleged payments he received from 'Huskers backers. It's probably easier to "cry wolf" after you've received a contract worth more than the national debt. Take the money and run, Mike.

While on the subject of contracts, I'd like to throw in a few words about Billy Sims. I had a lot of admiration for Sims after watching him run through K-State teams while playing for the University of Oklahoma. But I guess while he was in Sooner land, no one told him not to sign his name to two different contracts at one time.

Sims involved himself in a contract squabble with the Detroit Lions, his NFL team. So he signed a contract with the USFL's Houston Gamblers, but then apparently changed his mind and re-signed with the Lions. Now there are two teams claiming Sims as their own, while the former Heisman trophy winner says his interests weren't represented fairly. Nice going Billy, you've made a real mess.

Staff Writer

While on the subject of the USFL, I'd like to complain about Donald Trump, the owner of the New Jersey Generals. Trump has made more news this year by not signing people to contracts. Trump has made claims to be near signing everyone from Miami Coach Don Shula to the San Diego Chicken, bringing attention to his team without spending a dime.

Come on Don, let's leave the limelight to the players. I wonder if he's met New York Yankee boss George Steinbrenner.

Speaking of players wanting the spotlight, how about Jim Brown? Brown wrote the NFL record books 20 years ago as a running back for the Cleveland Browns. Now as Pittsburgh's Franco Harris is nearing some of his marks, Brown is showing a lot of class.

Although deep in his middle-age years, Brown has threatened to make a comeback to protect his records. Meanwhile, the ex-great has called Harris a sissy because he runs out of bounds instead of taking unnecessary hits.

A little closer to home, a guy that has really bugged me is Oklahoma basketball Coach Billy Tubbs. Tubbs has managed to offend almost everyone in the Big Eight Conference.

It all started in Boulder, Colo., where Tubbs nearly got himself and his team killed by making an obscene gesture to the University of Colorado crowd at the end of an exciting Sooner win over the Buffs. Since then, there hasn't been too much of a love affair between Tubbs and the other fans around the conference.

Tubbs also is the main cause of the league crack down on coaches. There have been a rash of technical fouls on coaches around the conference, stemming from Tubbs' habit of intimidating referees with his very abrasive bench style. The league, in trying to control Tubbs, has made it impossible for the other conference coaches to breathe on the sidelines.

The world of sports is becoming more and more complicated. To follow teams today almost requires a law degree, as players spend almost as much time in the courtroom as they do in the locker room. But think of it this way: as long as we have guys like these for comic relief between really important sports events, we fans will never be bored.

South African former policeman turns to crime

By The Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — South Africa's most-wanted criminal is a brazen bank robber and master of disguise who once was a rising star on the police force.

He uses his advanced police training in armed robbery investigations and undercover work on the other side of the law, leading a gang accused of some 20 bank robberies that netted more than $400,000 in the past six months.

While Andre Stander's daring and high life on the lam have made him a household name, the officers trying to nab him are increasingly frustrated.

"We need all the luck we can get," complained one veteran of the search.

And at week's end, there were reports that he may already have slipped past them and into the United States.

Standar, 36, an outdoorsman said to enjoy poetry and late nights at the discos, is the son of a retired police commander.

He rose swiftly in the force, reaching the rank of captain, when he was arrested in 1980 on charges stemming from 15 bank robberies and illegal possession of weapons.

Standar's father, retired Maj. Gen. Frans Stander, said his son turned to crime after being over- come by guilt at helping put down race riots in 1976.

However, nothing else has emerged to show politics or racial issues were a factor in his son's turn to crime. According to records from his conviction, the younger Stander had been strapped for cash.

He pleaded guilty to the charges and was sentenced to 17 years in prison. Then, last Aug. 11, he and a habitual car thief overpowered guards while waiting to see a prison therapist and escaped in a police van. Unconfirmed reports had him dining in fancy restaurants, hiding in black townships, even sunning on the beach in Mauritius.

Two months later, an armed Standar burst into a prison testing center and freed another of his jailhouse pals, a schoolteacherturned-armed robber.

Newspapers labeled the three "The Stander Gang," re-christening them "The Bank Hoppers" after they were suspected of knocking off two and three banks in an afternoon. One of those banks was a branch inside the terminal at Johannesburg's Jan Smuts International Airport, one of this terror-conscious nation's more heavily policed targets.

Investigators admitted Standar's strongest card was his intimate knowledge of police operations. He is acquainted with some of the officers tracking him; he even broke into a patrol car and stole a sophisticated radio, ideal for eavesdropping on his pursuers.

The gang is believed to have received some of its weapons in a robbery of a gun store, and is suspected in the thefts of several cars, always expensive ones.

A ploy was to take a salesman on a "test-drive" into the country, then ask him to drive back, telling him, "The wife is sort of choosy. I want to see how it rides on the passenger side." When the salesman stepped out, the car roared off.

More than once, police have come close.

Before dawn Jan. 30, officers crept around the swimming pool and tennis court of a home in the high-priced Johannesburg suburb of Lower Houghton. A few shouts were exchanged before the shooting started, with police lobbing tear-gas grenades and peppering the house with buckshot.

When they stormed the house, they found the body of Standar's August prison-break companion. Standar and the third fugitive were away.

Police won't say how they were tipped to the hideout. Since then, two other homes in wealthy neighborhoods were found to be rented by the athletic six-footer with bushy dark hair.

Neighbors recall the "bachelor businessmen" were gentlemanly and quiet.

The clerk at a video shop remembered Standar — using the alias Mark Jennings — used to hobble in on crutches with both legs in casts. The clerk said police making a spot-check for pornographic videos once entered the shop while Standar was on the way out.

Another time, according to police, patrolmen called at the Lower Houghton hideout to warn residents of burglaries in the neighborhood. Jennings thanked them.

Some 630 miles to the south in Cape Town, a man later described as effeminate went shopping with a colleague for a sailing yacht. In the space of an afternoon, they bought the 15-ton Lily Rose, ordered it provisioned for a trip to Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and hired a delivery crew.

A crewman suspected the buyers might be drug smugglers and told police, who seized the boat last weekend and said the effeminate buyer had been Standar in another of his disguises.

Newspapers reported that while paying for his hideouts and his yacht, Standar opened accounts at a bank he had robbed, and raised the possibility that he may have fled to the United States.

Kassebaum lauds group for efforts

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Sen. Nancy Kassebaum has challenged the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to work at the local level to break the cycle of poverty.

Speaking to the Kansas City, Kan. chapter Saturday, the Kansas Republican praised the organization for looking at whether there is a relationship between poverty and the family structure.

"This is a subject which has for years been taboo," Kassebaum said. "In addressing this question, the organization risks the criticism of those who indicate it is little more than an exercise in blaming the victims."

Kassebaum was given awards from the local chapter and NAACP Region IV for her work in the Senate.

Kassebaum said federal programs, such as Aid to Families with Dependent Children, have failed to break the poverty cycle, in which children born into poverty tend to remain in poverty. Some even say federal programs have perpetuated it, she said.

"There is a need to recognize that a final solution to a problem does not accompany the mere enactment of a law," Kassebaum said. "It could well be that we have about all the laws we need. Making these laws work, though, is an area where participation at the local level is critical."

Local NAACP chapters can conduct such activities as family counseling, tutorial assistance for students and improvements in child care, she said.

Trial of diamond dealer charged with fraud begins in KC

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A former official of the International Diamond Corp., which no longer is in business, goes to trial this week for alleged fraud in the sale of diamonds as investments in Missouri.

Thomas Lewsader is charged in Jackson County Circuit Court with three counts of securities fraud and three counts of stealing by deceit, said Randy Sissel, a spokesman for the Missouri attorney general.

Lewsader's trial, scheduled to begin with jury selection Tuesday, could last up to six weeks, Sissel said.

Lewsader, who was chairman of the board of International Diamond, was one of five company officials indicted in early 1982 on charges they created an artificial price structure for diamonds as investments and made promises the company could not keep.

The four others and the positions they held with the company were: John W. Hodge, vice president; Bernard Dohrmann, founder and president; George Kessler, national sales director; and Steven Greenbaum, executive vice president who worked in an IDC diamond lab.

Greenbaum entered a guilty plea Friday.

Lewsader will be the first of defendants to stand trial, according to his attorney, James F. Speck. All of the cases will be tried separately, according to Sissel.

The indictments were based on evidence gathered during a year-long investigation and presented to a grand jury by assistants of Missouri Attorney General John Ashcroft, Sissel said.

Representatives of IDC were estimated to have sold $1 million worth of diamonds in Missouri from 1978 to 1981. Investigators were told it was a $1 million-a-month business in 48 states.

"It was alleged to be the biggest diamond operation in the country," said John Perkins, Missouri commissioner of securities.

Authorities contend the company's diamond sales should have been registered as investment securities. It also is alleged that company salesmen misrepresented the investment potential of the diamonds as well as the purchase price and value of the gems, Sissel said.

"After someone bought a diamond from International Diamond, they could call a toll-free hot line for an update on the value of their diamonds," Perkins said. "International stones supposedly continued to go up in value even while the diamond market was actually going down.

"I think a lot of people who would have sold really stayed in the program because they were getting updates saying their diamonds were going up in value," Perkins said.

International Diamond was headquartered in San Rafael, Calif., about 30 miles north of San Francisco. The company's offices now are occupied by a computer software company.

International Diamond filed for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the federal bankruptcy laws soon after the indictments.

Politburo chooses new Soviet leader

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Konstantin Chernenko, a pillar of the Kremlin's old guard, was named leader of the Communist Party on Monday at the age of 72 — the oldest man ever to achieve the peak of Soviet power.

Chernenko, an ally of late President Leonid Brezhnev, succeeds Yuri Andropov, who died Thursday at 69 after 15 months in office.

When Brezhnev died in November 1982, it was believed Chernenko was Andropov's rival for the party leadership. After Andropov won it appeared Chernenko's political future was in doubt, but he retained enough influence in the top party ranks to grasp the top party post.

Chernenko was chosen by his 11 fellow members of the ruling Politburo. Unanimous approval Monday by the Central Committee was announced by the official news media at 2 p.m. as dignitaries from around the world gathered to attend Andropov's funeral.

The funeral will be today in Red Square.

It was not known if Chernenko would speak privately with Vice President George Bush and Senator majority leader Howard Baker Jr., who are representing the United States at Andropov's funeral.

Speaking before the Central Committee, Chernenko attacked Western leaders as posing a threat of nuclear war. He said the Soviet Union would strive to avert war by maintaining its nuclear strength.

The new general secretary does not yet have the extra title of president, with which Andropov and Brezhnev consolidated their power. The presidency probably will remain vacant until the Supreme Soviet — parliament — meets next. Parliament elections are set for March 4.

Tass said Chernenko opened Monday's special session of the Central Committee, which praised Andropov as an "outstanding leader of the Communist Party and the Soviet state, an ardent patriot, Leninist, a tireless fighter for peace."

Premier Nikolai Tikhonov, 78, made the official nominating speech.

Chernenko's career has been a slow and steady climb up the party ladder, alongside his mentor and friend of 30 years, Brezhnev. Tikhonov took note of the decades of party work in his nomination.

"Konstantin Ustinovich...knew the hard peasant labor, the service as a soldier, and everyday activities of a regional party committee in the countryside."

He called Chernenko a "talented organizer of the masses, an ardent propagandist of Marxist-Leninist ideas, an unshakeable fighter for putting into life the policy of our great party."

In his own speech, Chernenko made no specific proposals for resumption of U.S.-Soviet dialogue, and sounded the standard line in foreign policy, saying "we can very well see the threat created today to humankind by the reckless, adventurous actions of imperialism's aggressive forces."

Chernenko said he supports "the principle of peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems."

"We do not intend to dictate our will to others, but we will not permit the military equilibrium that has been achieved to be upset," he said.

U.S. Vice President George Bush, arriving at Moscow's airport, expressed regret at Andropov's death and hope that Soviets and Americans would "increase contact and cooperation" in future.

He said he came "to symbolize my nation's regard for the people of the Soviet Union and to signify the desire of the United States to continue to work for positive relations between our countries."

Because of Chernenko's age and his lack of background in formulating policy, there is speculation that decision-making and governing might be shared among other leading Politburo members.

Soviet foreign policy changed little during the brief tenure of Andropov and because Chernenko was so closely identified with Brezhnev it seemed unlikely he would make radical changes.

Andropov, who was ill when he took power and spent his last five months out of public view, suffered severe kidney disease and diabetes.

Proponents argue to raise state drinking age

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

Concern about underage drinkers crossing state lines to drink where the legal age is lower prompted James Hamilton, Lincoln, Neb., to come to Topeka. Hamilton and others testified about proposed drinking legislation on Monday during the first day of hearings by the Kansas House of Representatives Committee on Federal and State Affairs.

Bills are being considered which would raise the legal drinking age to 21, ban "drink and drown" nights at bars and raise the drinking age to 21 for all but on-premises consumption. Colorado is the one state bordering Kansas which has a drinking age of 18 for 3.2 beer.

Hamilton praised the decision made Friday by the Nebraska Legislature to raise the drinking age to 21, but expressed concern for young people living near state borders.

"Why would a man from Nebraska come to Kansas?" he said. "Because some of our young people are going to be driving over the border to drink."

Nebraska is surrounded by states with drinking ages of 18. Hamilton said if Kansas does not raise its drinking age, he fears a situation like that existing on the Illinois-Wisconsin border.

"One section of the border has become a blood bath where young people cross the line to go drink in Wisconsin," he said, holding up a newspaper with a lead story on the problem.

Jean Davis, highway safety specialist for the Division of Cooperative Extension, said Kansas should follow Nebraska's lead in raising the drinking age.

"I'm delighted that Nebraska raised their drinking age," she said. "But if we don't follow suit, the northern tier of counties will have a severe problem with young people crossing the line to drink."

Jim Burnett, chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board, also asked committee members to support a drinking age of 21.

"The safety board does not think raising the age to 21 will solve all drunk driving problems, but we do feel this is the single most effective step states can take," he said.

Accidents increase when the drinking age decreases, Burnett said.

In the early 1970s, most states lowered their drinking age," he said. "The typical result was a sharp increase in traffic deaths."

Burnett said he opposes a proposal by President Reagan's Commission on Drunken Driving to set a federal legal drinking age of 21 and cut federal highway funds to states failing to enforce it.

"We (the safety board) believe that it is not effective for Congress to say, 'Do this or we'll take your highway money away,'" he said. "It's more effective if the state legislature decides to do it."

Enforcement would be the major problem with a federal drinking age, Burnett said.

William Plymat, a member of the president's Commission on Drunken Driving, said it is unlikely Congress could pass a federal drinking age bill.

Panhellenic advisers seek records audit

By KAREN BELLUS
Staff Writer

The financial advisers of the Panhellenic Council called for an audit of the council's financial records during its bimonthly meeting Monday at the Alpha Chi Omega sorority.

Marilyn Poulson, chapter and financial adviser for the Alpha Xi Delta sorority, spoke on behalf of financial advisers for other sororities when she announced an audit will be scheduled sometime in April. The audit will follow tax preparation for the convenience of those involved with the council's books. Nine of the 11 sororities in the Panhellenic Council signed the motion calling for the audit, she said.

"We feel it is beneficial to have an audit every two years of the Panhellenic Council's books. We would like to assure ourselves that our money is being spent well," she said.

Poulson said the advisers didn't anticipate any wrongdoing and that they hoped to implement this practice (audit) regularly in the future.

Barbara Robel, adviser of Greek Affairs, read a prepared statement on behalf of the Panhellenic Council executive officers and herself. She said she received a telephone call Friday afternoon informing her that the financial advisers were planning to demand that she surrender the Panhellenic Council financial records.

"We, the executive officers and myself, are dismayed by your (financial advisers) concerns. And I think that more than concerns are

Candidates discuss election priorities

The Collegian staff invited student body presidential candidates Ken Heinz, junior in computer science, and Tracy Turner, junior in economics, to an interview Monday to discuss their campaign issues in greater depth.

Collegian: Tracy, what is your major goal if elected as student body president?

Turner: I guess my major goal is to get kids to really think about this University and what we want to tell people or prospective students. I guess my goal is to instill some sense of a long range or a big picture of the University. I think that in student government we tend to get caught up once in a while in the day-to-day problems.

I've been talking about student recruitment all along. I'm convinced that has to be the biggest problem facing us and has to be the No. 1 priority in my administration.

Collegian: What are the mechanics of instilling that long-range perspective?

Turner: The first thing I'll do is establish a cabinet position. I want one person to oversee student recruitment in its entirety. That cabinet member would be responsible for setting up the program this semester, because I want to be very active in the fall semester when things get started.

Specifically, I'd like to target freshmen. I think freshmen know the most people back in their hometown high schools and have the most time on their hands. At the same time, I think a lot of freshmen are excited about K-State. I think this is an opportunity to channel some of their enthusiasm in a positive direction.

Collegian: For clarification, an ambassador goes back to his home high school and makes a one-time presentation, is that right?

Turner: Yes. And I don't have any specific plan engraved in gold. If there are other ideas or other ways the ambassador wants to run it, that's fine with me, too. I think the most important thing is that students feel comfortable going back and talking to high school seniors on an informal basis.

Collegian: Do you think a single presentation can really have a major impact on a person's decision of where to attend college?

Turner: I sure do. I just think of my own experience. I had a lot of friends who were going to K-State. They were excited about K-State and they conveyed that to me when they were talking to me.

They didn't give hard-core factual presentations. Mostly they said, "I'm enjoying K-State. I think it's a well-rounded

See TURNER, page 12

Collegian staff: Ken, what is your major goal if elected as student body president?

Heinz: One of the big things I see is campus lighting. I've talked to Amy Button-Renz, who is the assistant director of the K-State Alumni Association, about possible sources of funding. One of the big sources we see right now coming up in May is the 1940, 1945 and 1950 class reunion.

Collegian: Since the Alumni Association does not have control over each class's donations, what would be the procedure used to procure the necessary money for lighting?

See related story page 10

Heinz: It would have to come as a proposal from the students. It would be a proposal to Amy, herself, I imagine. She would propose it to Mark Moore, director of giving for the KSU Foundation. He could present it (the proposal) during the reunion.

Collegian: Do you have a priority list of where lighting would go?

Heinz: I've heard some different ideas. I know the Natatorium (lighting) is really bad. I've heard a lot of people who use the Natatorium at night are scared to go over there. Quinlan Park is another bad area.

Collegian: Do you have any figures on what lighting for the areas would cost?

Heinz: I've heard a lot of different things. If you go with decorator lights, things really look nice, but it's going to cost more money than if you just put up a parking lot light. A parking lot light would give off more light and be more efficient, but it wouldn't look as nice. So it's a give-and-take (situation).

Collegian: Do you know what the range of costs is?

Heinz: This is just something where we'd decide the priority areas that need the better lighting. Then we'd have to decide what kind we want there. Then we'd go from there.

Collegian: What do you consider your major weaknesses for the office?

Heinz: No matter how much experience you have, or you think you have, it's not enough when you actually get into

School officials visit local students

Approximately 440 principals, counselors and math teachers from about 200 Kansas high schools and three Omaha, Neb. high schools will meet with their former students Feb. 22 in the Union.

The annual conference provides an opportunity for school officials to meet with K-State students to discuss the transition from high school to college and provides information to the high schools about how to better prepare students for this transition.

K-State students are asked to comment on how their high schools could improve class instruction, course offerings and requirements for college-bound students.

This year math teachers have been especially invited to attend. They will attend a math workshop in the afternoon, hosted by R. Richard Summerhill, head of the Department of Mathematics.

Seminar teaches business methods

Operators of small businesses can learn more about how to do business with the government at a "Government Contracting Seminar for Small Businesses" planned for Feb. 22.

The seminar is scheduled from 6-9 p.m. in Calvin 201.

The seminar topic will be "Selling to the Military" and is co-sponsored by the new K-State Small Business Development Center, the Manhattan SCORE chapter, the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and the Small Business Administration.

Instructors for the seminar are George Luckman, Department of Defense small and disadvantaged business utilization specialist; Ron Nelson, Department of Defense Logistics Agency; and Edna Van Lieu, Fort Riley Procurement Office.

The speakers will cover such things as Department of Defense organization, why the Department of Defense wants greater small business participation, and advantages and disadvantages of government contracting and subcontracting.

"I encourage students to be skeptical, and to really question the things the candidates say. After all, the issues and ideas we present are a direct reflection of the type of student body president we will be."

Student Recruitment:

I am stressing this issue because nothing can be more important than attracting new students to K-State, especially now that we are facing declining enrollments. Sending students back to their hometown high schools is the most effective way to tell the K-State story.

Campus Lighting:

My stand on this issue has always been that the safety and accessibility of our campus is a direct responsibility of the state legislature, and that the need for better lighting should come from tax revenues, not from the students' pockets.

Realism:

Above all, I'm not promising things that I can't deliver if elected Student Body President, particularly with problems like the library hours, advising, and dead week.

Professors react to Soviet party choice

By SUZANNE LARKIN
Staff Writer

The death of Soviet Premier Yuri V. Andropov provides an opportunity for the United States to seek improved relations with the Soviet Union, according to some K-State professors.

Joseph Hajda, professor of political science, said that now is a time for gestures from the United States to the Soviet Union.

"In view of the new replacement (of Andropov by Konstantin Chernenko), we now have the opportunity to explore different approaches to the conflicting interests between the two nations — it's a time for gestures and toning down of harsh condemnations," he said.

Hajda said Andropov's basic strategy for the relations between the two nations was neither optimistic nor pessimistic. Yet Andropov made an effort to improve feelings between the two nations, he said.

"Andropov made efforts to better the feelings between the two nations, but a coexistence between two countries with different social systems is not easy," he said.

Although he and Andropov were noted rivals, Chernenko shares his predecessor's stern attitude toward international relations with the United States.

"Both men have the same feelings about U.S.-Soviet Union relations. They are both hardliners. With Chernenko as the new party chief, not much will change in regard to Soviet relations. It would be like changing from Reagan to one of the members of his administration," Hajda said.

"Although Andropov's death has had no direct influence so far concerning United States and Soviet relations, his death gives us a new opportunity for better relations," David Kromm, professor of geography, said.

Kromm said better relations can evolve if the United States speaks with more respect toward the Soviet Union.

"To say a country is an 'evil empire' as the United States has spoken of the Soviet Union, we have put the Soviet Union on the defensive. We need to become more positive in our approach to better relations with the Soviet Union. We need to compensate for what has been said. Now with Konstantin Chernenko as the new party chief, we have a new opportunity for better relations," he said.

Robert Baumann, assistant professor of history, said there is no reason to expect a change in U.S.-Soviet relations.

"The Soviets have made a conservative move with the choice of Chernenko. They haven't tried to make a change to the 'new generation' since Chernenko is 72," he said.

Chernenko was a Leonid Brezhnev supporter and a less hard-nosed than Andropov, which will create little change in policy, Baumann said. "The inner circle is the same bunch of guys," he said.

Although no change is expected, there is a possibility of better relations in the future.

"It may be possible to establish a new and improved rapport with the Soviets now that a change has taken place, though it may take a year or so before improvements take effect," Baumann said.

A drastic change, he said, isn't really probable with the change of just one administrator.

"Even if Chernenko thinks differently than Andropov, he really cannot make changes without the rest of his government agreeing with him," Baumann said.

"Neither Brezhnev nor Andropov made any drastic changes, and I don't foresee any changes occurring now. Any changes will be gradual, though in six months to a year relations may be improved," he said.

U.S. welcomes cooperation with Soviet leader

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration said Monday it wanted to join the new Soviet leader, Konstantin U. Chernenko, in achieving "constructive cooperation" but emphasized that improving relations between the superpowers "has to be a two-way street."

With Vice President George Bush heading for Moscow to represent President Reagan at the funeral of Soviet President Yuri V. Andropov, officials in Washington said the United States would welcome discussions with Soviet leaders. But the likelihood of a meeting between Reagan and Chernenko remained uncertain at best.

Reagan's spokesman greeted the announcement that Chernenko would move into the top position of general secretary of the Communist Party by calling for closer ties between the two nations.

"We invite the new leaders of the Soviet Union to work with us in establishing a basis for greater mutual understanding and constructive cooperation," said White House spokesman Larry Speakes.

Speakes said Bush would stress "our commitment to peace and in particular to the search for mutually acceptable agreements" during his discussions in Moscow.

However, it was not clear Monday whether Bush would confer with Chernenko during his visit, although Speakes said the United States would welcome such talks.

In his first speech in his new post, Chernenko said the Soviet Union would match any security threat from the "hot heads of militant adventurists" in the West.

"We can very well see the threat created today to humankind by the reckless, adventurist actions of imperialism's aggressive forces," he said. "We do not intend to dictate our will to others, but we will not permit the military equilibrium that has been achieved to be upset."

The State Department, meanwhile, underscored a more conciliatory passage in the speech, and welcomed Chernenko's expressed support for solving international disputes through negotiation and his readiness to lessen tensions through practical deeds.

As for the possibility of an early meeting between Reagan and Chernenko, department spokesman John Hughes reiterated that the administration is interested in arranging such an encounter if a positive result can be assured.

Senate library action impractical

Student Senate unanimously approved a resolution Thursday night supporting the extension of Farrell Library hours.

Jerry Katlin, student body president and graduate in public administration, said one solution would be to keep the first three floors of the library open until 12:30 a.m. All floors now close at 10:30 p.m.

By approving this resolution, senate is displaying its concern for augmenting study facilities for the student body.

But this solution limits itself in several ways. First, it would be impractical and unfeasible to close off the remainder of the library so that only the first three floors remain open, Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said. A better option would be to provide reduced services or, at times, no service to the library patrons, while keeping the entire building open, he said.

Currently, the major consideration blocking such an extension of library hours is lack of money. Katlin's proposed "shifting money between accounts" fails to show knowledge of the financial situation of the library while also displaying contradictory priorities.

At the senate meeting, Katlin proposed taking $50,000 from the current library materials budget and shifting funds into personnel. He argued this would allow the library to pay the personnel needed to operate the library during the extended hours.

He then suggested that $200,000 from one of those two accounts be shifted back into the library budget, thus bypassing the accounts that are specifically designed to purchase materials.

While this "little bit of a game," as Katlin called it, might look good to senate on paper, it fails to even begin to address the financial problems of the library.

Taking money away from an account that is designed to increase the library's resources is not taking the University's welfare into consideration. The primary purpose of a university library isn't to become a study hall for students. Its purpose is to provide the research resources an academic community requires.

What is most disturbing is the lack of information on the part of senate. If it is to act on such issues, senate must be properly informed. The first step would be to consult with library and administration officials so that proposals and feasible solutions are complementary.

Rec complex use merits praise

Hooray for K-State!

The one-millionth person walked through the doors of the L.P. Washburn Recreational Complex on Saturday, three years and four months after its doors opened for student, faculty and staff use. In January 1984 alone, 50,539 people used the complex, 43,744 of whom were students.

Joyce Halverson, assistant director of recreational services, estimated that almost 80 percent of K-State students have used the Rec Complex at one time or another.

Such statistics deserve commendation and congratulations. Besides reflecting the growing trend in recent years toward achieving physical fitness, K-State is demonstrating a genuine interest in and awareness of good health.

The Rec Complex has facilities for basketball, racquetball, handball, running and jogging, weight training, martial arts, badminton, tennis and table tennis, as well as offering programs in aerobics, jazz exercise and Jane Fonda workouts. The facility is equipped with locker rooms, a sauna, Lifecycles stationary bicycles and an outdoor fitness cluster.

Intramural competition accounts for much of the Rec Complex's popularity. Greeks, hall residents and independents compete in a variety of sports ranging from powerlifting to water polo in both individual and team divisions. In addition, the Lifeline program promotes cardiovascular fitness on an individual level with running, bicycling and swimming challenges that prepare athletes for triathlon competition.

The support demonstrated for the Rec Complex and its programs shows that K-Staters are not only getting their money's worth of a wise investment of student fees, but also learning to value and appreciate physical fitness. This healthy attitude can only be termed smart thinking.

Romance alive and well today

WASHINGTON — Is romance healthy in America?

You can bet it is, judging from the lucrative week the confectionary, flower and greeting card industries are now having. On Valentine's Day 1984, consumers will buy about $102 million worth of flowers (three percent of annual floral sales), $385 million worth of candy (it's the industry's largest sales day of the year) and 300 million greeting cards.

Yet behind the commercial aspects of affection is a more intricate story of ongoing changes in love and relationships. While marriages are increasing and divorces are decreasing for the first time in years, romance itself may not have recovered from the tumbles it's taken in the past decade. Romance may seem alive and well on Valentine's Day 1984, but some of its more studious observers voice caution about its prognosis.

In the interest of the season, and since our expertise on the subject is lacking, we asked some authorities on romance — sorry, but they're not names from the pages of People magazine — to present their opinions on the state of courtship 1984. Herewith their mixture of offerings:

Lorna Sarrel, director of the human sexuality program at Yale University: "My sense is that, in comparing the 1950s to the 1980s, coeducation has been helpful in breaking down the misunderstanding and mystique that existed before. So today there's the potential for more intelligent, real kinds of relationships between men and women."

"Yet because of earlier sexual involvement in general, more young people have been scared by the pain of relationships ending abruptly. We tend to underestimate that, not realizing that it's almost as traumatic as divorce. So many young people I see are weary of trusting. I hope they will develop a cautious sense of realism."

Edward Brecher, author of

several books on sexuality: "I'm very optimistic about love and romance. The iron-bound corset of Victorian nonsense no longer inhibits couples from finding a kind of relationship that is appropriate to themselves. When I was young, courtship and marriage and affairs and all relations between men and women were like a military drill in which you did what the sergeant — often the priest, rabbi and minister — told you to do. Today it's like a free-flow dance, as it should be."

Dr. Shirley Zussman, sex therapist and past president of the American Association of Sex Educators, Counselors and Therapists: "The sexual freedom that was so hailed by a generation ago is now being re-evaluated. Now many of that generation's members are questioning the value and meaning of the sexual freedom that permitted them to go to bed with a casual partner. I think such people are seeking more commitment and more of a relationship that has some degree of caring. It's a period of introspection for them."

"These people are working harder, and having more doubts and uncertainties about the future. They want someone to care about. And many of them are thinking that they are not going to find it, so they are more anxious about what kind of future they're going to have. They are no longer 20 and they are wondering if they are going to be alone for the rest of their lives."

George Leonard, author of "The End of Sex": "The whole idea of recreational sex is not so celebrated as it was two years ago. There is more celebration of romantic love. AIDS and herpes have made us all take a second look at the joys of unbridled, joyous sex. People are interested in intimacy, romance and commitment."

Dr. Leah Schaefer, author and therapist: "I think there's been a kind of leveling of sexual behavior, and people are becoming much more concerned with love and romance than they ever were. As the world becomes more mechanical with computers and more frightening because of the arms race, it causes people to feel the need for personal and intimate relationships to a much greater degree. The horror that we face in the world forces us to find warmth and intimacy in our relationships."

Professor John Gagnon, author and sociologist: "I think it would be more reasonable if people were slightly less interested in love and romance in general. My sense is that a fairly large number of long-term intimate relationships are developed based on people not thinking enough of what their individual needs are."

Dr. Michael Quadland, sex therapist, Greenwich Village, N.Y.: "The gay community is in mourning this Valentine's Day, having lost 1,300 members to AIDS. People are depressed. People are not only mourning the loss of lives, but a sexual lifestyle that they enjoyed for a long time. They are also mourning the loss of good will of the heterosexual community which once again sees them as a threat because of the AIDS epidemic. Yet, there is a silver lining in all of this. Gay men have become much more careful about their sexual behavior. They are engaging in courtship again."

The Iron Triangle, Kansas style

When I think of the Iron Triangle, I usually think of the Pentagon and Washington, D.C. Occasionally, however, evidence of the love affair between big business, the military and Congress surfaces right here in Kansas. On Feb. 2, I saw an example of the Iron Triangle, not in some smoke-filled Foreign Legion Post, but on the front page of our own Collegian.

On Feb. 1, officials were informed that McConnell Air Force Base would be the home of a wing of 16 new B-1 bombers. Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, according to the Associated Press, said that she had opposed the bomber in at least 20 votes, but would now drop her opposition.

On the surface it would all seem quite natural. Most of the people I've talked to say, "Danny Boy, that is the American way!" Is she not voting what her constituents want? Wichita stands to lose an estimated $98 million now that the Titan 2 missiles are being dismantled in May. Kassebaum said, "I am pleased that as long as we are having the B-1s, that some will be stationed at McConnell."

Wichitans are "happy" because they will regain some outside revenue they stand to lose with the dismantling of the Titan 2 missiles. The Air Force is happy because they have gained an important vote for the B-1 weapon system. Kassebaum is happy because she may get some more votes out of Wichita in

Collegian Columnist

November. Everybody seems delighted with the exchange, well, almost everybody.

What bothers me is that she is the Chairperson of the Senate Military Reform Caucus, a group that "seeks efficiency in defense spending." By her own admission, she has voted against the intercontinental nuclear bomber 20 times. As chairperson, surely her vote carries some weight.

Why change now? If she is opposed morally or fiscally, why should jobs in Wichita make a difference? Doesn't it bother you to know that the Air Force can change her vote by moving 16 airplanes to Wichita? Are we saying that having a price on one's vote is "The American Way?"

The argument bounces back: isn't she simply seeing that her constituents get a piece of the military pie?

If she is opposed to the fiscal irresponsibility of our arms race, then she should continue to oppose the B-1 bomber. If it were stopped, much more money would come not just to Wichita, but the rest of Kansas.

If she and her constituents are concerned about jobs, they should remember that military spending is the least efficient way of providing jobs. It costs one-tenth as much to provide a job through social or capital spending.

Senators' six-year terms were originally provided to ensure that statesmen would participate in the U.S. political system. Statesmen, by definition, are supposedly not affected by special interest groups, and act in the general interest of the public.

Coincidentally, Kassebaum will be on campus today. The topic of her speech is "Washington perspectives on Central America." You might think that the issues are not related, but for me they are. At issue is the nature of her position. Did Kansas send her to Washington to be a "team player," to bend to the will of Reagan or the military? Does her support of the Reagan military budget and human rights policy reflect her own views?

Come tonight. Ask her if it is in the interest of Kansas for her vote to have a price military dollars can buy. Ask her if it is in Kansas' interest to sacrifice 45,000 Salvadoran civilian lives in alleged defense of our liberty.

You elected her and you pay her salary, therefore she owes you a straight answer.

Aid to El Salvador wasted on death squads

Editor,

Re: the editorial cartoon in the Jan. 30 Collegian:

In this cartoon the president is shown dumping a load of dollars down a manhole, which turns out to be the "o" in "El Salvador." The sage Kissinger advises, "You need a bigger truck."

This cartoon gets across the simple truth that our massive investment in El Salvador has been wasted. Since we began our support in 1978, the oligarchy's Miami bank accounts have swollen and revolutionary forces have gained strength with the help of captured and stolen American-made military supplies.

But this is only half the problem with the Kissinger Commission's proposal for increasing aid. Not only has our aid been squandered, it has maintained in power a group which has managed in the last three and a half years to eliminate more than 40,000 unarmed opponents — a figure that, translated into its equivalent with respect to the total population of the United States, would amount to nearly half the population of Kansas — and all this without so much as a single criminal conviction.

The death squads are not "out of control" in El Salvador. They are all too obviously in control. And whether we "want" it or not, it is our continuing support that maintains them in control. The Kissinger Report, recommending higher levels of aid, only rewards and sustains their butchery. The time has come to cut back. Let those in power negotiate, emigrate or justly suffer the fate of the thousands they have stripped of their lives and property (including, it is worth noting, the many enlisted men they have squandered along the way).

This is the only pragmatic and moral alternative to the policies of Reagan, Kirkpatrick and Kissinger. A truly "tough-minded" president would break our habit of supporting tyrannical regimes and learn to do business with popular revolutionary forces such as the FDR/FMLN of El Salvador and the Sandinista government of Nicaragua.

The interests of our nation are not served by methods that violate our fundamental sense of decency and make enemies of people who otherwise would be our peaceful neighbors.

Prayer column demonstrates free speech

Editor,

Re: Lauri Diehl's column, "A prayer for prayer in schools," in the Feb. 6 Collegian:

Let me begin with praise for Diehl's prayer. It is refreshing to see such stories in print demonstrating that each individual, regardless of his or her belief, has a right to be heard, irrespective of how ignorant or narrow-minded that belief may be.

I would question Diehl as to just what "acceptable beliefs" she thinks our children should learn, but I fear she would miss the point. The pursuit of religious freedom which led to the founding of this country was a response produced by people being told how to worship and how to live.

However noble Diehl's motives may be to save children from their godless parents, it should be clear that her faith, like her column, is strictly a matter of opinion. Religion is a personal matter. It cannot be proved or disproved as it exists by the beliefs of its faithful. Religion cannot be induced, cajoled or forced, and mandatory school prayer will never cause the unwilling to find

God, whether Diehl's or anyone else's.

The merits of public prayer can be debated, but those of imposed religion cannot. But although Diehl's column enraged and offended me, I cannot help but recall Voltaire's words: "Though I disagree with all you say, I defend to the death your right to say it." The same government that ensures such freedom prevents Diehl's nightmarish prayer from coming true. Thank God.

Vehicle inspection law aids used car buyers

By TOM STALLBAUMER
Collegian Reporter

By knowing the laws concerning vehicle inspections, consumers may be able to save themselves time and money when buying used cars.

In 1974 the Kansas Legislature passed a law requiring every vehicle sold in Kansas to pass an official motor vehicle inspection. The law also requires the inspection of cars being licensed for the first time in Kansas. Exceptions to this law are new cars and cars being sold as junk.

The inspection may be carried out by anyplace designated as an official vehicle inspection station.

According to the "Kansas Highway Patrol Official Motor Vehicle Inspection Manual," these official inspection stations are divided into four classes.

Stations with a class A permit may inspect all motor vehicles. Stations with a class B permit are allowed to inspect all passenger cars and small trucks with a single rear axle and single wheels. A class C permit allows inspection of trucks only. Stations with a class D permit may inspect all types of motorcycles.

Many businesses which sell used vehicles have them inspected before selling them. If a consumer buys a vehicle from another individual, the responsibility for having the vehicle inspected is either that of the buyer or of the seller, depending on the terms of the sale, according to the manual.

The first step in having a car inspected is to find an official inspection station. Many service stations and car dealers (both new and used) are official inspection stations.

The inspection of the vehicle usually takes from 30 to 45 minutes for passenger cars and light trucks. According to the manual, inspection includes eight areas of the vehicle: registration, brakes, tires and wheels, suspension and steering, lighting and electrical, vehicle glazing (glass), body and exhaust.

By being aware of what is involved in an inspection, a buyer of a used car may be able to make better decisions about the condition of a vehicle and the costs involved in getting a vehicle to pass an inspection.

The first area, registration, requires that the vehicle identification number (VIN) be firmly attached to the vehicle. If the VIN is not firmly attached, the vehicle will not pass the inspection.

The odometer reading also is checked. The odometer is the part of the speedometer that registers the number of miles traveled. It must function properly for the vehicle to pass.

The second area to be checked is the brakes. Both the front and rear brakes are inspected. There are a number of mechanical checks performed, including inspection of the brake linings and a road test to check for proper function of the brakes. If any problem is found in the brake system, the vehicle is rejected.

The tires and wheels also are checked. The tires must have sufficient tread depth and may show no signs of unusual wear. If a tire is worn worse on one side than the other, has bumps on the tread or cracks on the sidewall, the vehicle will be rejected.

The fourth area is suspension and steering. This section requires the checking of all front end suspension, including tie rods, ball joints, wheel bearings and shock absorbers. The steering is checked for excessive free play and the front end is checked for proper alignment.

In the check on the lighting and electrical system, the inspection determines whether all lights are in working order. The headlights must be aimed correctly and the turn signals, taillights, tag light and all side marker lights must function. The back-up lights do not need to work, but may not be on when the vehicle is in any gear other than reverse. The horn must be in good working order and be loud enough to be heard for a distance of not less than 200 feet.

The sixth section, vehicle glazing, is concerned primarily with the windshield and other glass. The windshield cannot be cracked, chipped, scratched or discolored anywhere in the field of vision of the driver. The side windows cannot have sharp exposed edges or discoloration which exceeds more than three inches up from the bottom. The side window must roll up and down, in case the driver must use arm signals.

Section seven of the inspection involves checking the body of the vehicle. There must be both an exterior rear view mirror and an interior rear view mirror. The mirrors may not be cracked or loosely installed. The windshield wipers must function and the windshield wiper blades cannot be torn or hardened. The vehicle's safety belts also are checked. If any seat belt is damaged or missing, the vehicle will be rejected. The seats also are examined. They must be firmly attached and in good working order.

The final section involves checking the exhaust system. There may be no leaks in the exhaust system, nor may the system be excessively loud. The exhaust system must reach past the rear axle of passenger vehicles to pass an inspection.

These eight sections of the vehicle are inspected in more detail and with more technical methods than described. However, by looking over a car in these areas, a consumer may be able to more readily judge the condition of the vehicle, and in the long run, save the expense and frustration of buying something that should be called junk.

Dealers urge changes in inspections laws

By TOM STALLBAUMER
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas New Car Dealers Association wants to change the Kansas law concerning vehicle inspections.

Ed Schram, president of Ed Schram Dodge Inc. and regional vice president of the Kansas New Car Dealers Association, said the Kansas Legislature needs to change the laws governing the state inspection system.

"The Kansas New Car Dealers Association has been trying for three years to get the Legislature to either have a meaningful inspection or to abolish it," Schram said. "An inspection station needs to be paid at least their cost to conduct an inspection, and there should be at least yearly inspections on all cars, or they should do away with the inspections altogether."

In 1974, the Kansas Legislature passed a law making it mandatory that all used vehicles, bought or sold, or vehicles being registered in Kansas for the first time be subject to an official inspection. The fee for such an inspection was set at $5.50, and it remains the same today.

The fee charged for performing inspections is one of the reasons many car dealers want the law changed.

Capt. David Hornbaker of the Kansas Highway Patrol in Topeka, said the fee being charged now is unreasonable.

"The law went into effect in 1974. Now it's 1984, and the fee is still the same," Hornbaker said.

"The basic purpose of the inspections is to inspect for safety defects," he said. "This could help to reduce the severity and frequency of traffic accidents in which defects are a contributing factor. It is an attempt to have the vehicles on the highway in good operating condition."

While there is little disagreement about the purpose of the inspection program, some people in the Manhattan area who are involved with the inspection program say there is too much work involved in an inspection for the fee charged.

Wendell Fritson, service manager at Goetsch-Irvine Chrysler-Plymouth-Subaru, said the biggest problem is the pay received for inspections.

Regie Gray, of Gray's Westloop Service, said there is too much work involved in an inspection for the money.

"You can make some of your money back if you can get the job of repairing the cars that don't pass the inspection. If all you do is inspect the vehicle, you're losing money," he said.

Mike Thieme, mechanic at Ed Schram Dodge Inc., said inspection fees are unfair to mechanics who work on a commission.

Briefly

By The Associated Press

Carol King campaigns for politics

DES MOINES, Iowa — It's been a long journey for Carole King from her multimillion-copy album "Tapestry" in the 1970s to the presidential campaign trail.

What began as a minor brush with the government has turned into a campaign to help Sen. Gary Hart of Colorado win the Democratic nomination and unseat President Reagan.

Since the 1970s, when King helped launch a "soft rock" era, she has moved to Idaho to live on a ranch and "enjoy the simple pleasures." A dispute with the U.S. Forest Service over her desire to close a road through her ranch led her to politics.

She said in an interview last week that she's typical of people who once were turned off by politics, but now are getting involved.

"There is a whole network of people untapped out there, people who believe as I do, who are just waiting to be reached and ignited," King said.

She said some people feel their one vote won't make a difference. "I can reach those people and say, 'Listen, your small voice does count, and if you add your voice to somebody else's voice and then somebody else's voice and we all put our voices together, we've got a big voice.'"

Gospel/soul group back on track

CALUMET CITY, Ill. — At the age of 69, Roebuck "Pops" Staples, founding father of the Staple Singers, won't rest on the laurels his group achieved with mid-1970s hits like "Respect Yourself," "I'll Take You There" and "Heavy Makes You Happy."

"I'm always trying to do something that will inspire somebody," Staples said. "I'd like it to be said when I'm gone that I contributed something to my country."

The family group is preparing to record its first album in three years, targeted for a February release, followed by an eight-city tour that will mark Staples' last public appearances with the group.

Staples said the new music will capture the unique sound that brought the group a gold album and three No. 1 singles in the 1970s — an electric mixture of gospel and soul with a dollop of folk.

The Staple Singers sound evolved more than 60 years ago on a farm in Drew, Miss. Staples and his 13 siblings would gather to sing after a long day of farm work.

"We didn't have radio, we didn't have a piano, we didn't have nothing," he said. "So to amuse ourselves, we sang after we got out of the fields. We would start singing and the voices would go across the field and people would hear."

U.S. women impress actress

NEW YORK — Actress Nastassia Kinski says American women, with their "hipness and interest in everything," impress her more than European women who are "dreamy-like."

"I've met women here who were 24, 25 (years old), heads of companies, some politicians (who were) real tough and had it all together, full of life and did 100 million things a week," Kinski, 23, said in an interview in the March issue of Glamour magazine.

"It was just so new to me — their hipness and interest in everything," she said.

"European women are more dreamy-like. They're more concerned with the women within themselves and their family lives, rather than with 'How much can I do? How much can I prove?'"

Solar zoning ensures right to sunlight

By The Associated Press

ASHLAND, Ore. — When Scott Rogers complained about the shade that would be created by a house under construction next door, a city ordinance forced the builder to lower the roof line.

"It could have been pretty disastrous as far as neighborhood relations go," Rogers said. "But we seem to have come out of it fairly well."

Ashland, in the shadow of the Siskiyou Mountains, in a state renowned for its rainfall, seems far from the ideal spot for a solar home.

But in the three years since it became the first municipality in the United States to adopt a comprehensive zoning ordinance to protect access to sunlight, it has become a model for the nation.

"I have a feeling there is a seed growing out there," said John A. Fregonese, the city planning director, who has answered hundreds of requests for copies of Ashland's solar zoning ordinance since it went into effect in October 1980.

"It continues to grow, despite the lack of interest or hostility from the federal government. It just makes good sense."

Under the ordinance, a new building must be situated so that in the winter it won't shade its neighbors between 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. Shadows cannot be any greater than those cast by a 6-foot fence on the property line.

The sunlight falling on a piece of property is recorded for future reference. If a neighbor's trees later grow to shade someone's solar zone, they must be trimmed. However, if a tree was there first, it is protected.

The law protects access to the sun on every lot in new subdivisions, and developers get a bonus of 20 to 30 percent more units per acre if they are energy-efficient.

The ordinance grew out of local interest and Fregonese's own desire to protect future solar access.

"Logic said that solar access was really going to be a problem," Fregonese said. "If another house shaded you, it would be like someone going out and cutting your utility lines."

A compact city of 15,000, Ashland sits on the northeast slope of the Siskiyou Mountains. The cloudy winter skies screen an average of 75 percent of the sunlight. Still, the sun that sneaks through is enough to make solar technology pay.

"We have solar apartments, solar low-cost units, solar mansions and even a solar car wash," said Fregonese. "I think it's been pretty well established that solar access is a pretty good idea."

"There is a lot of sympathy around here toward the kind of thing where energy conservation is involved — small-scale things that...will have a nationwide impact," Fregonese said.

The first year after the ordinance went on the books, 17 percent of new homes in Ashland included solar technology, ranging from south-facing windows to solar water heaters. The next year that went up to 40 percent.

After a dip to about 20 percent during the 1983 recession, half the house site plans now approved use solar principles, Fregonese said.

Despite its heavy rain — as much as 200 inches a year in some places

— Oregon is a leader in solar zoning, said Henry Markus of the state Department of Energy. After Ashland took the first step, nine Oregon cities and one county adopted solar ordinances. Five others, including Portland, are studying the idea.

Oregon offers tax incentives to homeowners and businessmen to turn to solar technology for at least part of their needs.

Markus, Fregonese and others also have banded together into an informal organization they call the Oregon Solar Access Network, which meets regularly to trade information.

Recent innovations in applying the ordinances include a solar site selector, which is a specially equipped camera to document solar access, and a computer program Fregonese wrote to figure out shadows cast by a proposed building. He's sold the software to 10 communities.

Debra Stangl, an Omaha, Neb., attorney specializing in solar access law, said Ashland's ordinances are among the best in the nation. Other states with some sort of solar zoning include California, New Mexico, Nebraska, Colorado, Wisconsin, Iowa and Minnesota.

The ease with which Ashland guarantees a property owner's right to sunlight has even won friends among the builders who were initially frightened by it.

A recent survey for Ashland by Conservation Management Services, Inc., a consultant service in Bend, found that only two builders out of 28 contacted didn't like the package of city laws.

Students reveal likes, dislikes in local poll

Since the time before Romeo and Juliet, single men and women have been looking for the perfect mate.

Times have changed and a balcony simply isn't the ideal spot to find that special someone any longer. According to a straw poll conducted by the Collegian, K-State students frequent many different spots in search of fun and romance.

Of the 130 students polled, 45 chose the bars of Aggieville as the best place to meet members of the opposite sex, while 27 others chose the more practical approach of attending class with the hope of meeting a new friend.

"I don't like to go to bars," Mary Lou Alsop, junior in interior design, said. "It's nice if it's just natural, like in a class."

The traditional meeting spots aren't suitable for everyone, and more creative alternatives are used by some students. These include meeting at the laundromat, library, recreation complex, and for a few, a browse in the bookstore.

For the majority who go to Aggieville, this type of encounter has both positive and negative aspects.

"Aggieville provides a good social atmosphere — bars, movies, pinball — a place just to hang out. And, that's fine," Rick Efros, counselor at the Counseling Center, said. "But if you want time alone, people are always around. It may make it difficult to relate in a straight situation if one is always meeting in a drinking situation. It is important to interact in various contacts, more isolated, less social."

After meeting many people, most students formulate an opinion about what they prefer and dislike in a potential dating partner.

Of the students polled, 77 said an attractive appearance is one of the most important characteristics for a potential date to have, 64 chose personality, and 34 deemed intelligence necessary.

While appearance, personality and intelligence were the top three preferences of the students polled, a greater variety of dislikes were mentioned.

Some of the frequently mentioned traits men said they dislike in women included smoking, laziness and too much makeup. The women said they dislike profanity, sloppy dressing and "macho" men.

"It's easier to talk about the negative,"

Efros said. "When people talk about what they don't like, they're getting down to idiosyncrasies. But they need to learn to deal with these differences and accept them. Maybe it's just a matter of experience, and dating is a way to gain this experience."

The dating experience is a learning experience, he said. The participants learn of the drawbacks of a relationship as well as the positive aspects. Dating is a way for people to gain a better understanding of themselves, to learn to communicate and develop relationships.

In general, dating satisfies the natural need for socializing and the need to be close to someone. It helps satisfy the desire to be worthwhile and likeable, Efros said.

Dating is a training ground for marriage because about 95 percent of all people end up marrying, he said. Dating also helps people interact with people.

"They're getting positive things from it. One drawback might be, 'Oh, I might get hurt,' but most go ahead and take the chance because they might get things from it. Some people just stop because they've been hurt so much, but rejection is just part of the game. Everybody has to face rejection," Efros said.

Besides rejection, students said lack of time is the biggest drawback of dating, as well as the expense and the feeling of being tied down. Twenty-two students said there are no drawbacks.

Several students mentioned another type of emotional pressure they feel while dating.

"There is pressure that it should lead to something, some type of statement about your relationship. I think maybe this inhibits (the dating couple's) ability to enjoy the non-serious part of the relationship," Reid Anderson, junior in management, said.

"I think single dating thrusts people into a serious relationship too fast. They don't have time to think about it before it is already too serious," Marie Conlin, senior in English, said.

There is a problem finding time for all the things students need to do, like being together and going to class. Couples tend to spend less time with their friends, Efros said. "There needs to be a balance between a sense of couple and just being an individual," he said.

A windsurfer takes advantage of the warm water at Tuttle Creek Reservoir last summer. A bill recently introduced in the Kansas Legislature may require windsurfers to wear life jackets instead of just having one available while surfing.

Windsurfing course offers water thrills

By TOM FAY
Collegian Reporter

The sensations of catching a gust of wind with the sail, feeling the board speed across the water and sailing over a wave may explain the growing popularity of a new sport — windsurfing.

Jeff Oaklief, junior in pre-design professions, and his brother, Greg Oaklief, freshman in computer science, are assistant instructors of the windsurfing class offered at K-State.

The class, which costs $60, is offered twice during the year, one month in the summer and one month in the fall. Depending on students' schedules, classes meet either on Monday and Wednesday or on Tuesday and Thursday for about two and a half hours each time.

Between 10-15 students participate in the class, which provides one hour of credit, Jeff said.

"Before you can offer an hour of credit, you must have a person teaching who has a bachelor's (degree)," Greg said.

Marge Oaklief, Jeff and Greg's mother, is the official instructor of the class. Jeff and Greg were hired to be her assistants.

The class is held in a cove at Tuttle Creek Reservoir near the K-State boathouse. "Conditions at Tuttle are not bad," said Jeff, who began teaching the course in summer 1979.

"Outside the cove you've got to be careful, because the only problem about Tuttle is that you get big waves sometimes," Jeff said. "That's really hard for beginners, because it's hard to stand on the board. You want to find someplace where it's pretty calm, but at the same time there's a little wind, like the cove."

Windsurfing, like most other sports, has some regulations. A bill was recently introduced in the Kansas Legislature that may require participants to wear life jackets instead of just having one available when windsurfing.

"I think it's a pretty good idea (to require life jackets), because if you get really tired, you can just stop and rest. You don't have to worry about swimming," Jeff said. "And there are times if you're out in high winds and you get a really good wipe-out, your board will take off and you'll end up in the water 20 feet away (from the board)."

Students participating in the course are required to wear life jackets at all times, Greg said.

The sport is competitive and "at schools where there is inter-collegiate racing, it is mandatory that you wear a life jacket when windsurfing," Jeff said.

The board used in windsurfing is composed of a centerboard, skeg (a six-inch fin on the back of the board), mast, sail, boom (the steering mechanism) and a universal joint which attaches the mast to the board.

The most common board used is called a fun board, which is 12 feet long, Jeff said.

U.S. grabs first gold medal with giant slalom victory

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — "Now America's got it."

Debbie Armstrong won her gold medal, the first for the U.S. Team at the Winter Olympics, with a tough, twisting tour down the side of a mountain on Monday.

"America has been waiting for this," someone shouted to the beaming Armstrong at the finish line immediately after her victory became apparent. "Now America's got it," Armstrong fired back.

After days of poor hockey, weather delays for events in which the American team was expected to do well and poorer than expected performances by some team members, Armstrong and the other members of the giant slalom team came through in record-smashing fashion.

Her gold medal was the first for an American woman in 32 years in the giant slalom and the first in any Alpine event at the Winter Games since 1972. She led a 1-2-4 placing that was the best ever for the United States in any Olympic Alpine, even outduelling veteran Christine Cooper,

Tracksters set marks

The K-State men's and women's track squads had a record-setting day at the Domino's Pizza-Illini Classic held Friday and Saturday at the University of Illinois.

The women finished third in the team standings with 47 points. The University of Wisconsin took first place with 57½ points, the University of Missouri placed second with 51½ and Pennsylvania State University came in fourth with 46.

Donna King broke her own K-State record in winning the 300 yard run in 35.04.

The team of Erin Ficke, Anne Stadler, Lauretta Miller and Deb Pihl won the two-mile relay with a Wildcat record time of 8:53.41. The time was a national qualifying mark and an Armory Fieldhouse record.

Pihl won the mile in 4:39.77, which also was a national qualifying mark and Armory record.

Shot putter Pinkie Suggs set a

K-State record with a toss of 50-9½, which was good for second place.

Jacque Struckhoff grabbed fourth place in the two-mile with a national qualifying time of 10:07.32.

Rita Graves took first in the high jump at 5-foot-11½, good for an Armory record and national qualifying mark.

For the men, Bryan Carroll set a 'Cats indoor record in the two-mile with a time of 8:44.51.

Mike Bradley was second in the 600-yard run with a time of 1:09.57.

Ron Stahl won the open two-mile with a time of 8:56.56, while Ray Mosier took the open 880 in 1:56.72.

Bob Leetch won the mile run in 4:06.34.

Veryl Switzer took second place in the long jump with a jump of 24-3¼.

No team scores were kept for the men.

who won the silver.

Armstrong, 20, of Seattle, Wash., was an unlikely hero. A relative newcomer to international competition, her best finish in World Cup competition was a third earlier this season. Cindy Nelson, the acknowledged leader of the U.S. women's team, has predicted that Armstrong would be the star of the U.S. team within a year or two, but Armstrong is now ahead of that schedule.

Cooper was the leader after the first run, holding a slim one-tenth of a second lead over Armstrong. Two of the favorites, American Tamara McKinney and Switzerland's Erika Hess, had virtually skied themselves out of the medal picture. McKinney was eighth after the first run, and Hess was 11th.

McKinney clocked the best time on the second run, a 1:11.72, but it wasn't enough to get her a medal. Perrine Pelen of France claimed the giant slalom bronze medal for the second straight Olympics, and McKinney was in fourth place.

On the second run, Armstrong put together another near-flawless effort. Cooper, skiing immediately after her, slipped at the fifth gate, falling back onto her skis. She recovered, but the mistake cost her precious seconds. Armstrong's second run was clocked in 1 minute, 12.01 seconds; Cooper came in at 1:12.51, a half-second slower.

Hess wound up seventh. Nelson, recuperating from a knee injury, was 18th. West Germany's Irene Epple, silver medalist at the 1980 Olympics, couldn't overcome a recent knee injury and finished 21st.

Armstrong's combined time for two runs was 2:20.98. Cooper finished at 2:21.38, Pelen at 2:21.40 and McKinney at 2:21.83.

"I just had fun, that was the difference, I think," said the 5-foot-5, 137-pound Armstrong. "I saw the course yesterday, and I knew it was a good hill for me."

"From the minute I got up this morning, I felt good. I knew if I kept my head together and skied positive, I had a chance to win a medal."

"I made a couple of mistakes, but I gave it my best shot. Those were the two runs of my life. All the way down I thought this was my only chance, and I better do it now, so no holding back."

It was the United States' first gold medal in Olympic Alpine skiing since Barbara Cochran won the slalom in 1972. It was the first gold for an American in the giant slalom since 1952, when Andrea Mead-Lawrence won at Oslo, Norway.

Cooper, 24, of Sun Valley, Idaho, admitted her slip "probably cost me the gold. In general, I just didn't ski as cleanly that second run. It hurts a little to be so close (to the gold), but I'm happy with the silver."

Pelen nearly lost her ski pole at the start of her second run. "I managed to hold onto it, and I pushed for speed to make up for the mishap," she said.

McKinney, 21, of Squaw Valley, Calif., said she "made a couple of mistakes on my first run, but I feel really good about my second run. It would have been nice to be 1-2-3, but 1-2-4 isn't bad."

Hess, the World Cup overall standings leader, said she "skied badly. This course was quite difficult. I'm looking forward to slalom, because that's really my discipline."

'Sleepy' plans to be lawyer

By The Associated Press

Golden State guard Eric "Sleepy" Floyd, who got his nickname because of the droopy appearance of his eyes, hardly is asleep when it comes to planning for his future.

Although he's just about given up hope of going to law school while still in the midst of his budding National Basketball Association career, Floyd still plans to become a lawyer after his playing days. If he does, he will follow in the footsteps of his uncle, John Guthrie, a lawyer in Greensboro, N.C., and a sister, who is studying law at Howard University.

"I don't want to be connected with basketball once my playing days are over," said the 6-foot-3 guard. "I definitely have being a lawyer in my plans. I don't want to be a coach."

Floyd, who as a starter for the Warriors in his second pro season is averaging 18.4 points per game, had hoped to pursue a law degree either during the summer or at night during the NBA season.

But he found that no major law schools offer summer programs, and he was discouraged from taking night courses.

Floyd said he majored in political science at Georgetown University "because I always wanted to be in the thick of things. I wanted to find out how everything worked and I was close enough to Washington (D.C.) to do that."

Last summer he worked for the Washington law firm of Hudson, Leftwich and Davenport and calls that "a great experience."

New Jersey selected Floyd 13th in the 1982 NBA draft of college players, but with several veteran guards on the roster, he averaged less than 12 minutes of playing time and 5.3 points per game in a half season for the Nets. Then he was traded to Golden State, along with Mickey Johnson for Micheal Ray Richardson, a swap the Nets have come to regret.

"New Jersey was like a Catch-22 situation for me," Floyd said. "The minutes I got were not important minutes. I was in there a lot in blowout games. You can't get experience that way or in practice. I'm normally an aggressive player, but I stopped taking risks."

After the trade, Floyd averaged 11.7 points and 23 minutes in 33 games for the Warriors, but in the last five games of the season, he scored 23, 24, 25, 17 and a season-high 28 points — performances that probably earned him a starting role this season.

Leonard's return fight postponed

By The Associated Press

WORCESTER, Mass. — Sugar Ray Leonard's Feb. 25 comeback bout against Kevin Howard was postponed Monday when the former welterweight champion's eye doctor told him to rest for at least 10 days, the fight's promoter said.

Dr. Edward Ryan at the Massachusetts Eye and Ear Infirmary in Boston examined Leonard's eyes Monday morning and found "some preventive work needed to be done in one of Ray's eyes," said Dan Doyle, president of KO Inc. of Hartford, Conn.

Doyle said he had no details of the nature of Leonard's eye problem or which eye was examined.

Valentine history dyed red with blood

By TONA TURNER
Collegian Reporter

Valentine's Day, the traditional celebration of love on Feb. 14, has its history in bloody murders which occurred on that day during the Roman Empire.

On Feb. 14, A.D. 270, St. Valentine, a priest in Rome, gave his life as a sign of his love for Christ. St. Valentine's execution was ordered because he refused to renounce his faith in Christ as ineffectual. During that time it was forbidden in Rome to express one's faith in Christ publicly. Valentine was beaten with clubs and beheaded by servants of the Roman emperor, Claudius the Goth.

Though the legend of Valentine's Day primarily focuses on St. Valentine of Rome, Roman martyrology mentions another Valentine as well. The second St. Valentine died 60 miles from Rome and is believed to also have been decapitated on Feb. 14 by the same emperor for the same reason as St. Valentine of Rome.

Alban Butler, in his book "Butler's Lives of the Saints," said no one knows for certain that the two Valentines existed, but there seems to be no conclusive reason for doubting either martyr's existence.

Until the 14th century, Feb. 14 was celebrated as a Christian festival commemorating the martyrdom of St. Valentine of Rome. During the later part of the 14th century, Valentine's Day lost its religious effect and became a day for lovers.

"Sending love notes on St. Valentine's Day stems probably from the belief that it marked the mating season of birds," Butler wrote.

The lovers' day theme of the modern holiday stems from the theories about the St. Valentines and their deaths on Feb. 14th and the ancient belief that birds begin to mate on this day.

"St. Valentine's Day is an example of a legend, not history," the Rev. Norbert Diab of St. Isidore's University Parish, said.

Feb. 14 also marks the date of the St. Valentine's Day Massacre. This was a multiple killing of rival gangsters by Al Capone's hitmen in Chicago in 1929.

Capone, nicknamed Scarface Al, was the head of a widespread crime syndicate. Capone disguised eight of his men as police officers, and they supposedly moved in to arrest a group of gangsters under George "Bugs" Moran. After "arresting" them, Capone's men murdered the group.

Campus election costs 'out of hand'

Candidates spend more money to win

By TIM FILBY

Money may not buy votes in student government elections, but it doesn't hurt candidates to spend more than their opponents.

In this year's student body election, four students fought for berths in the presidential run-off election. The two candidates who won places in the run-off, Ken Heinz, junior in computer science, and Tracy Turner, junior in economics, not only collected the most votes, but also had the largest amount of campaign expenditures.

Current policy limits presidential candidate expenditures to the total incidental fee for one academic year. This year the fee is $820.

Of the four student body candidates, Heinz, who won the general election, came closest to the limit by spending $805 on his campaign, according to campaign expenditure reports. Runner-up Turner was the next highest spender, using $781 for his election bid.

The two candidates eliminated in the general election, Dana Hawkins, senior in journalism and mass communications, and Eddie Rodriguez, junior in pre-law, placed third and fourth respectively in the voting.

According to expenditure reports, Hawkins also placed third in campaign spending with $739 in expenditures, while Rodriguez allotted the least amount of money, $490, for his campaign.

By earning the top two places in the general election, Heinz and Turner each are allowed to spend $205 for the run-off election — one-fourth of the funds available for the general election. Consequently, the total amount of money candidates are permitted to spend on campaigns is $1,025.

Candidates use the majority of campaign funds on political advertisements in the Collegian, according to expenditure reports. Other costs include items such as buttons, posters, banners, stickers and other incidental expenses, such as food for political rallies.

Heinz said the amount of money spent on campaigns for student body president has gotten out-of-hand.

"They put this campaign expenditure limit into legislation when tuition was a lot cheaper," he said.

"There might be people who are interested in running for office, but can't because of the price involved."

Heinz said he wasn't sure how much of his campaign money came from his own pocket, but said much of his funds came from individual contributions.

Turner said he also believes campaign costs are too high. He said candidates are "being priced out of the market." Funds used in his campaign were primarily provided by himself, as well as from his parents and other relatives.

Candidates for Student Senate positions are allowed to spend one-tenth the amount of incidental fees for one academic year, which was $82 for the general election this year.

Of the various senate elections, 10 candidates spent more than $60 on their campaigns, according to expenditure reports. Of the 10, only one candidate was not elected.

Steve Lawrence, freshman in general and successful candidate for Arts and Sciences senator, said name recognition is important in campaign spending.

"I think I spent more money on advertisements in the Collegian than on posters and other materials," he said. "You can't really say a lot on posters, and it's important to get name recognition."

While student body presidential candidates utilize contributions from supporters as well as individual funds, senate candidates rely more on themselves for campaign money, putting a strain on their personal budgets.

"Running for office is a big strain on my budget, but I included the cost with my books and tuition because I knew I had an inclination to run," Lawrence said. "I think it's an investment well worth it."

Campaign spending is regulated through the Student Governing Association. Eric Kintigh, sophomore in pre-dentistry and Elections Committee member, said he keeps track of Collegian advertising, posters on campus and other campaign materials to make sure candidates are following the spending guidelines.

Student body presidential candidates were required to turn in four expenditure reports throughout the campaign, while senate candidates were required to submit only one.

Audit

being voiced. I feel some allegations are being made. But what is more dismaying is the secrecy of your approach," Robel said.

She said she was referring to the fact the advisers had met privately to discuss the possibility of an audit and had made several calls to the National Panhellenic Council regarding her office and a possible audit without first confronting her with their concerns. Robel said the financial records have been open and available for inspection.

Robel also said the Panhellenic Council had recently experienced a random audit by the Internal Revenue Service. The IRS audited the council's 1982-1983 books to ensure that it met non-profit organizational requirements. She said the IRS found no wrongdoing, but made minor suggestions concerning advertising.

The council also has volunteered to undergo an audit for the 1984 books, Robel said. A private accounting firm will both audit and prepare taxes for the council.

Poulson said the advisers recommended that the audit be completed by a non-Greek accounting.

A recent recommendation by the K-State Traffic and Parking Council may mean that moving traffic violations will be handled on campus in the future.

The committee has recommended that the University handle minor traffic offenses internally rather than send offenders to district court, Art Stone, director of the K-State Police Department, said.

"It would take some of the burden off the court," he said.

Currently, campus police issue county tickets for moving violations because K-State is not within the Manhattan city limits. Under the new system, which would go into effect July 1, campus police would have the option of issuing county tickets or University tickets.

Campus police would choose whether to give a county or University ticket on the basis of how serious the violation is, he said.

"The option really remains with our department," he said. "If the offense is such that it's extremely serious, we would still have the option to take them (violators) to district court."

For instance, running a stop sign or speeding would probably be handled through the University, but an injury accident or a flagrant violation might be referred to the district court, he said.

The distinction is particularly important because a University ticket would not appear on a person's driving record. One reason to send more serious violators to district court is to ensure the violation receives more punishment, Stone said.

"They (serious violations) should be reflected on a person's driving record," he said.

Fine money collected from University tickets would be paid to the University rather than the county, he said.

Persons would still have an opportunity to appeal University tickets, he said, but they would do so through the Traffic Appeals Board rather than a court appearance.

Stone said all council recommendations will have to be approved by the Board of Regents later this year. The University will try to get more reactions from faculty and students before the proposals are taken to the regents, he said.

"Sometime during the month of April there will be open hearings concerning all (traffic and parking) changes for next year," he said. "Anybody and everybody has a right to be heard (at the meetings)."

Referendums encourage voter turnout

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

The only consistent trend in the student body president elections since 1970 is low voter turnout.

Voter turnout increased in 1973, 1976 and 1979 when fee issues were included on the ballots.

"Every time you have a referendum of some kind on the ballot, you will find that the voting will jump," Chester Peters, vice president for student affairs, said.

In both the 1973 and the 1976 elections the referendum concerned the L.P. Washburn Recreational Complex. In 1979 the issue was the coliseum.

"The biggest factor in getting students to turn out to vote is a major issue which has pro and con interest," Peters said. "Get people excited and they will participate on a much heavier level."

Jerry Katlin, student body president and graduate in public administration, said he noticed a significant increase in voter turnout last year.

"In 1983 they did not require you to have your fee card (to vote), and there was a great increase in the number of votes cast that year than in the previous year," he said. "I think that was a direct result of not requiring fee cards."

"Voter turnout has a lot to do with the weather," Katlin said. "If it's a cold or rainy day, students aren't likely to get out to the Union, especially those who live in residence halls in the area of Ford or Haymaker halls."

Katlin agreed with Peters that controversial issues encourage students to vote.

The issue in the 1984 student body presidential election is how to improve the environment of the campus on both practical and intellectual levels, Peters said.

"We had four candidates in this campaign who did as good a job as any four have ever done in not competing against each other, but in deciding what is best for the University," he said. "It was the best presentation of themselves, and I think it will continue in that way."

There are ways other than issues to increase voter turnout, Peters said.

"The Collegian tries (to get people to vote) through editorials, the candidates try through signs and leaflets and by talking and debating," he said. "They have done everything they can, I think, to get a good response."

Personal contact is the most effective way to get students to vote, Peters said.

"The best way to get a higher turnout is for every person who votes to ask every other person they see, 'Have you voted today?'" Peters said.

There does not appear to be any trend in the type of students who run for president or in the candidates who win, Peters said. Also, there does not seem to be an advantage in being in first or second place going into student body president election run-offs, he said.

"The person who was leading has won more times than the other person, but there are enough times that the person in second has won that you can't really say it is an advantage," Peters said.

Katlin said he would prefer to be in the second-place position going into the run-off.

"The advantage to being in the second position is that you know you're the underdog, so you work that much harder. There is a tendency when you're in first place to think you don't have to work very hard," he said. Student reaction makes being in second place an advantage, Katlin said.

"There is a real tendency, by students, to look at the results in the general elections and see someone is in first place and to think, well, he's in first place so he doesn't need me to vote for him," he said. "I would really rather be in second place because you would work harder and there is not that attitude among voters about you."

There does not seem to be an advantage in the elections from being part of the Greek system or living in a residence hall, Peters said.

"You can't really say that just because a person is in a residence hall or is affiliated with a small living group that that is a factor," he said.

Candidates' strengths lie in the way they present the issues and themselves and, to some degree, the way they run their campaigns, Peters said.

"There have been some very close elections," he said. "This one will be close too."

Police recover stolen cars

A 1974 white, four-door Chevy Impala was stolen from the Farrell Library parking lot Sunday night, a spokesman from the K-State Police Department reported. The keys to the vehicle were left inside. It was recovered Monday morning at 1107 College Ave., according to the Riley County Police Department.

Another stolen car, a 1975 Pontiac Grand Prix taken from the downtown area, was recovered Sunday night in the parking lot between Durland and Ackert halls.

The 1975 light-blue Mercury Monarch that was taken from the Edwards Hall parking lot between Feb. 7 and 10 has not yet been found.

These incidents "don't appear to be connected," said K-State Police spokesman Lt. Charles Beckom. "When people leave the keys in their car, it's a great incentive (for people to steal the cars)."

school. I think it has a lot to offer and I really hope you consider those things."

Collegian: What do you consider your major weaknesses for the office?

Turner: I think my major weakness would fall into the area of delegation of authority. I'm the kind of guy who always likes to have my thumb in the pie, so to speak. I recognize that, and I'm trying to work on that because I think it's important the student body president be able to delegate authority and let it rest at that.

Collegian: What do you consider your major strengths for the office?

Turner: I think my major strength is my age and my experience. I've had three years on this campus.

job. You learn so much when you are pressed into action.

Collegian: What do you consider your major strengths for the office?

Heinz: I'm not a politician. I'm just a student, like 18,000 other students here at K-State. I've got genuine concerns for the University. I talked to Jerry Katlin in quite detail about what the job entails. I talked to Bill Rogenmoser, the president before him (Katlin). I just think I could do a good job of representing the students at K-State.

ASK leader testifies on drinking age

By MIKE TURNER
Government Editor

"Raising the drinking age is selective prohibition, pure and simple," said Mark Tallman, executive director of the Associated Students of Kansas. Students should not be singled out for a problem all society shares, he said.

Tallman testified before the Kansas House Federal and State Affairs Committee on Tuesday during the second day of hearings on a bill to raise the legal drinking age for 3.2 beer to 21 and another to raise the drinking age to 21 for all but on-premises consumption.

Tallman said national statistics from states that have raised the drinking age are not conclusive.

"Minnesota and Massachusetts each reported increases in alcohol-related traffic deaths among young people after raising the drinking age," Tallman said. "In Michigan, after a widely reported initial decrease in accidents, the trend appeared to reverse itself."

Also, rates of alcohol-related highway accidents among younger drivers were not affected in Iowa and Florida after those states raised the drinking age, he said.

"Persons under 21 do not make up a disproportionate share of the drunk driving problem relative to other age groups," he said.

Legislature '84

Data from 1982 indicated persons under 21 accounted for 10.2 percent of alcohol-related fatalities. The same group accounted for 9 percent of the licensed drivers, he said.

"This is hardly disproportionate," Tallman said.

There are a number of reasons raising the drinking age could cause more harm than good, he said.

"First, such laws are difficult to enforce and lead to widespread flaunting of the law," he said.

"Even if such a law reduces accidents, it is at the cost of undermining support young people have for the legal system. This was precisely the lesson of prohibition."

Tallman also said that if students ignore the law and continue to drink, there may be a temptation to drink harder alcohol. Another concern is that raising the drinking age may divert attention from other solutions to the alcohol problem, such as education.

Brett Lambert, sophomore in pre-law and K-State campus director of ASK, said alcohol education efforts of Boost Alcohol Consciousness Concerning the Health of University Students (BACCHUS) are beginning to show some effects.

One word — malaise — could sum up student attitudes before the alcohol awareness campaign, Lambert said. Students were very uninformed about how alcohol affected their bodies, he said.

Current programs are focusing on a non-alcoholic beverage (NAB) drive, Lambert said. The alcohol information is being eagerly accepted across the University, and requests have been received for more information from faculty, Greek houses and residence halls, he said.

BACCHUS plans to step up its action in the future. "There will be more dry functions than ever in the past," he said.

Bob Story, spokesman for the Kansas Beer Retailers' Association, said it is obvious that a drinking and driving problem exists.

"This legislation does not address what to do with drinking drivers," he said.

In 1982, 74 out of 838 arrests for driving under the influence of alcohol in Shawnee County were attributable to the 18-20 age group, Story said. In 1983, the same age group was still only responsible for 125 of 1,222 such arrests, he said.

The 18-20 age group also has less than 3 percent repeat offenders. The 1983 repetitive rate for the general population was 9.3 percent in Shawnee County, Story said.

"Beer will always be available to those who want to purchase it," he said.

Soviet, U.S. officials agree on need to talk

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Vice President George Bush met with Konstantin U. Chernenko on Tuesday and said the new Soviet leader agreed on the need to resume talks on serious U.S.-Soviet disputes. But Bush said "it's way too early" for a summit meeting.

Speaking to reporters after the 30-minute meeting, Bush said the tone of the discussion was "excellent," but did not give him ground to make any predictions about a possible resumption of the Geneva nuclear arms talks.

Chernenko agreed with him, however, "about the need to place our relationship upon a more constructive path," Bush said.

The vice president was in Moscow as President Reagan's representative at the Red Square funeral Tuesday of Yuri V. Andropov.

The meeting between the two men comes at a time when U.S.-Soviet talks have halted in virtually all areas, and Bush said the two men "were quite frank" about the problems that have brought U.S.-Soviet relations to rock bottom.

Bush said he presented Chernenko with "a substantive" letter from Reagan that "conveyed the president's determination to move forward in all areas of our relationship with the Soviets, and our readiness for concrete, productive discussions in every one of them."

But he declined to describe in detail the exchange with Chernenko or to say what specific proposals, if any, were made by either side.

Bush, asked for his personal impressions of the 72-year-old Chernenko, said "He ran the meeting with full authority. He looked very well and was very gracious."

Chernenko was "clearly self-assured in his dealings with us" and was "in full control," Bush said.

The Soviet Union walked out of the Geneva talks on reducing medium-range and strategic nuclear weapons last November after the start of NATO's deployment of nuclear rockets in western Europe.

The Kremlin has said repeatedly that Washington must roll back the deployment before talks can start again. The Tass account of the Bush-Chernenko meeting suggested that the Soviet leader repeated that stand to Bush.

"It was stressed...that the U.S.S.R. will do everything necessary to safeguard the interests of its security and that of its allies and friends," Tass said.

Senator urges drinking laws' enforcement

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

A proposal to institute a federal drinking age of 21 has strong support in Congress, said Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan., at a press conference Tuesday afternoon.

According to Kassebaum, in the past, proposals to stop drunken driving have been considered, but "there is stronger support for effort on a federal level to restrict drunken driving than any time in the last five years. This is the first time a proposal has been made using age as the determining factor."

Federal attempts to stop drunk driving are "a worthy focus," she said, "but we must not lose sight of the fact that age is not the only factor. I still see enforcement of existing laws as the best control."

When questioned about the presence of U.S. Marines in Lebanon, Kassebaum said she supports changing current peacekeeping measures.

"I've been very supportive of the President's policies until recently," she said. "I think the current situation is a disservice to the Marines. I think it is time to bring them home."

One alternative is a United Nations peacekeeping force like that in southern Lebanon.

"It is always said that the Soviet Union would veto this (peacekeeping force) in the Security Council," she said. "I'm not sure they would anymore. We should try, and then we'd know."

Kassebaum was asked if the situation in Central America would have an effect on President Reagan's reelection.

"It is hard to predict at this point in time what will be a political liability," she said. "For instance, (the U.S. invasion of) Grenada was very popular. But if 300 people had been killed, it might not have been so popular."

The United States has an interest in the stability of Central America, but Americans often have the wrong idea about how to maintain that stability, Kassebaum said.

"With Central America, we seem to have this idea that we can rush in with a lot of money and fix things. You can't buy friends," she said. "Then when things go better, we forget them until the next crisis."

Regarding the possible Nicaraguan elections, Kassebaum

Kassebaum calls U.S. attitudes 'unsophisticated'

By TOM SCHULTES
Collegian Reporter

"Perhaps it says something about attitudes in the United States that we have reserved the name 'Americans' for ourselves. Historically our awareness of the other Americans has been unsophisticated."

With these opening remarks, Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan., opened the 1984 Lou Douglas Lectures on Public Affairs in the Union Forum Hall on Tuesday.

In a lecture titled "Washington Perspectives on Central America," Kassebaum, who headed the U.S. delegation to monitor the 1982 Salvadoran elections, addressed the issue of U.S. involvement in Central America.

During the first portion of the lecture, Kassebaum discussed the history of Central America and what the United States' aims should be regarding the area.

"Traditionally our policy has been oriented toward three goals: the exclusion of foreign influence; the maintenance of U.S. leadership in the region and the encouragement of political stability throughout the hemisphere," she said.

"However, our history of intervention in pursuit of those objectives has been uniformly counterproductive," she said.

Goals were then replaced by the "Good Neighbor" policy that paved the way for solidarity during World War II, she said.

It was then that the "communist threat, real or perceived, caused a re-evaluation of policy toward Latin America," Kassebaum said.

During 1961-1970, almost $20 billion was invested through the Alliance for Progress government plan, she said.

But increased economic standards in Central America did not result from these allocations. Instead, poverty and tension actually increased.

"Today the poorer get poorer, the wealthy are wealthier, and the military is stronger," Kassebaum said. "We have a long history in Latin American involvement. We have made many mistakes in Latin America."

Kassebaum said both Cuba and Nicaragua have "a deep-seated animosity towards the United States."

Referring to the 1982 political elections in El Salvador, Kassebaum said, "We (U.S. foreign policy enforcers) could have delivered a body blow to the guerillas' effort, which they may not have recovered from.

Much could have been accomplished (to deter guerilla efforts) if pursued."

She said some 5,000 troops have gained the initiative over some 20,000 government troops.

"There sometimes appears to be a lack of seriousness on the part of the Salvadoran military. They act as if the war is being fought on their own schedule," she said.

In reference to the upcoming El Salvadoran elections on March 25, Kassebaum said, "I do not have a great deal of optimism (for the U.S. position) in that election, but one never knows. Elections must come from real democratic aspirations. We must effectively reconcile opposing positions."

Surprise Druse attack prompts American fire

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Druse insurgents launched a surprise offensive Tuesday and captured a strategic mountain corridor from government troops. A U.S. warship opened fire twice — during the Druse attack and again when Lebanon's Defense Ministry came under fire, American officers said.

The Marines fought a mortar duel at daybreak when their base came under fire from the southeast — five hours after a rocket attack. No Marines were injured, U.S. spokesmen said.

Lebanon radio said Syrian-backed Druse militias controlled a mile-long corridor between the Chouf Mountains southeast of Beirut and the Aley Mountain ridge east of Beirut despite U.S. bombardment and repeated attacks by Lebanese jets. An army communiqué said its soldiers retreated after being "outnumbered and outgunned."

The victory gives the Druse a long-sought corridor to the sea.

U.S. Marine spokesman Maj. Dennis Brooks said the destroyer Claude V. Ricketts hit artillery positions in the Syrian-controlled central mountains with 42 rounds from its five-inch guns after nightfall.

The half-hour bombardment was in retaliation for renewed shelling attacks against the Lebanese Defense Ministry in Yarze near U.S. Ambassador Reginald Bartholomew's residence, Brooks said.

U.S. rejects advice from Egypt's leader

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak called Tuesday for "direct dialogue" between the United States and the Palestine Liberation Organization, but the Reagan administration immediately rejected the advice.

"You can't control the statement of a departing chief of state," said a senior administration official. "You don't endorse it by just standing there."

Mubarak and Jordan's King Hussein had concluded talks with President Reagan when the Egyptian delivered his prepared statement.

"The Palestinian people are entitled to your support and understanding," Mubarak said. "There is no substitute for a direct dialogue with them through their chosen representative, the PLO."

He said PLO chief Yasser Arafat is "a responsible leader who has demonstrated tremendous courage under the most difficult circumstances."

Mubarak, head of the only Arab country officially at peace with Israel, also told Reagan at the meeting the PLO "has opted for a political settlement and can deliver," said the senior U.S. official, who declined to be identified.

Later, asked if he expected the United States to talk to the PLO, the Egyptian leader said "they oppose that, of course." But he said "it's the only way we have" to support Palestinians.

Hussein refused to be interviewed. But Mubarak said, "I think we have the same feeling."

Mubarak has gradually steered Egypt toward the Arab mainstream after succeeding the slain President Anwar Sadat in 1981 and has called in the past for a PLO negotiating role. But by urging Reagan to deal with the PLO, Mubarak publicly challenged the president on his own grounds, the White House, to make a major shift in U.S. policy.

Journalists host regional contest

K-State will host the annual Kansas Scholastic Press Association Regional Contest for area high school students Friday in the Union and Kedzie Hall.

About 400 students from 26 area high schools will compete. The Manhattan contest is one of five regional competitions scheduled this week, with others being held in Hays, Pittsburg, Wichita and Lawrence.

The day-long contest will begin at 8 a.m. with registration in the Union Courtyard. Competition will begin at 9:30 a.m.

Students will compete in on-the-spot writing and photography contests, with 13 areas being offered. Members of the journalism faculty, university personnel with journalism backgrounds and area media professionals will judge the individual entries.

Entries will be judged Friday, and awards will be given at an awards ceremony at 3:45 p.m. in Union Forum Hall.

K-State students belonging to the Society of Collegiate Journalists and journalism majors also will be involved in the contest, assisting judges and serving as proctors.

Student to study in New Zealand

Boyd Holk, junior in restaurant management, is the first male exchange student K-State has sent to the University of Otago School of Home Science in New Zealand. He will enroll Monday.

Holk is one of 22 men in the restaurant management program in K-State's College of Home Economics. The college has a total of 61 men in its various curricula, but at Otago there are no men in home science.

Holk is working on degrees in restaurant management and economics, while adding a third emphasis on German language. The extra year he'll spend studying in New Zealand will enhance his goal of working in Europe for an international company.

College officials estimate the award is worth about $5,000 because the University of Otago will provide Holk's tuition, room and board, and an allowance of approximately $800 for personal expenses. He will return next fall.

Blue Valley school wins game

Students at Blue Valley High School at Stanley netted a 22 percent profit on an imaginary $100,000 stake to win the state championship in K-State's fall Stock Market Game.

Results announced by the K-State Center for Economic Education show that the team turned in a portfolio worth $122,208.31 to win the 10-week contest.

Sherrelyn Smith, an American government and economics teacher at Blue Valley, was adviser of the winning state team. Individual team members were Pat Cobler, captain; Jim Anderson, Bob Conner and Amy Stuhr.

Nearly 2,000 students forming 350 teams represented their schools from across the state. They were organized in five high school regions, plus categories for elementary schools and individuals.

Contest coordinator Bette Zikmund said the contest serves as a teaching and motivational tool for instructors of business, mathematics, social studies and economics classes. The game is offered each fall and spring.

The teams begin with an imaginary $100,000 stake to invest in common stocks. Contest rules allow them to borrow up to an additional imaginary $100,000 on margin. Each team turns in daily transactions based on actual stocks prices and current events, which are then processed by the K-State Computing Center. Each team is sent weekly portfolios which summarize its financial status.

I have a complaint about an instructor. Who do I file it with?

When a student has a complaint, he must first discuss it with the instructor. If the problem cannot be resolved to the student's or instructor's satisfaction, he may then make an appeal, in writing, to the head of the department. In addition, the student may make a request to the dean of his college for an ombudsman. The ombudsman will arrange meetings of all concerned and report the results to the appropriate persons. This ombudsman will act as an unbiased expeditor for the student. If the matter has still not been resolved, another written appeal may be made to the dean of the college the instructor teaches in. Only after these steps have been taken may the student make a written appeal to the Undergraduate Grievance Board. The board consists of two faculty members appointed by the Committee on Academic Affairs of the Faculty Senate, two students appointed by members of Student Senate and one faculty member, serving as chairman, appointed by the assistant provost for academic affairs. The board assumes final jurisdiction over the case.

What can you tell me about the contraceptive sponge?

The contraceptive sponge is a button-shaped device about 1 1/4 inches in diameter that fits over a woman's cervix. The sponge is treated with a spermicide and thus acts as a combination chemical and barrier method of birth control. In part of a Food and Drug Administration study, the sponge was found to be 92 percent effective among those participating in the study. The contraceptive sponge is available over the counter and costs about $3 for a package of three.

Can a landlord enter an apartment without the tenant's permission?

According to Kim Hefley, director of Consumer Relations Board, a landlord can enter an apartment under certain conditions. With these conditions he must give reasonable notice that he will be entering the apartment. A landlord may enter during reasonable hours, and the purpose of the entry must be for inspection, repairs, providing services and showing premises to tenants or potential tenants, purchasers or workman. The landlord may enter an apartment without consent if it is an emergency, or if the tenant has been gone for more than 30 days. Further information about landlord-tenant laws may be obtained from Consumer Relations Board, located in the Student Governing Services office on the ground floor of the Union.

Manhattan residents celebrate blacks' history

Although progress toward equality for blacks has been made, the search still continues for total equality, said keynote speaker Murt Hanks, former Manhattan mayor and city commissioner, at the Fourth Annual Frederick Douglass Commemoration on Tuesday at the Douglass Community Center.

Since 1926, February has been designated Black Awareness Month, and the commemoration was part of this year's celebration.

Douglass, for whom the center was named, was a black leader who lived in the 1800s. He founded an abolitionist newspaper and held government posts in later years.

Anne Butler, director of Educational Support Services, began the program by asking those present to reflect on the history and culture of black people.

Hanks said it is important to remember the many contributions made to the black movement and to marvel at the progress that has been made over the years.

The search still continues for the dream of tomorrow, for a new reality in the community — equality, Hanks said.

The important thing to remember, Hanks said, is to continue to exercise the right to vote. Not only is it a right, but it is an obligation that has been paid for by many sacrifices, he said.

Speaking on the topic of blacks in education, the Rev. James Boyer, pastor of the Fellowship Temple Church of God in Christ, said that the same spirit Frederick Douglass exemplified must be used to fight the problem of illiteracy among blacks.

"Black education has come a long way, but has an awful long way to go," Boyer said.

To conclude the commemoration, several members of the U.S. Army Correction Activities gave a historical dramatization of blacks' accomplishments in their struggle for excellence in education.

Refreshments were served to the approximately 40 guests following the program.

Senate exchanges diplomas for extra weekend of study

A proposal to eliminate tentative grades for graduating seniors was passed Tuesday by Faculty Senate.

Currently, finals week begins on Friday to allow two days prior to graduation for instructors to prepare grades for graduating seniors. Upon final approval of the proposal, finals week will begin on Monday rather than on Friday, and seniors will not receive their diplomas at graduation.

A resolution designed to show support for the policy was previously passed by Student Senate. The proposal will be forwarded to President Acker for final approval. If approved, the measure will become effective in the spring of 1985.

"This is a motion initiated by students. They want to give up receiving their diploma at graduation to get a two-day study weekend before finals," said John Eck, senator and professor of physics.

Currently grades are prepared before graduation so graduates can receive their diplomas at graduation ceremonies. Students have decided they would rather have the weekend before finals week, he said.

"I hope we have continued support for the graduation ceremony from faculty and parents, even though they (students) don't get their diplomas," John Riley, senator and associate professor of economics, said.

Faculty Senate also approved a list of curriculum changes. Seven courses were added, one was dropped and several courses were approved for graduate credit.

The Faculty Senate Executive Committee met after the senate meeting. Nomination ballots for faculty representatives to the Senate will be distributed next week. Ballots should be returned by March 5, said Richard Gallagher, Senate president and professor of electrical engineering.

to El Salvador, Kassebaum said. "How are we to assure that these $8 million...will not flow to the same few (people) as has been done before?"

Following the prepared lecture to a near-capacity audience, the senator opened the floor to questions.

She said that during the 1982 elections, the Salvadorans would support anyone who would give them peace, regardless of political affiliations.

She also said, "There should be dialogue and negotiations with the guerrillas. They may not get to the point of (initiating) elections, but it doesn't hurt to try."

She expressed concern about the presence of approximately 5,000 U.S. troops in Honduras, "a nation which is also very poor (like El Salvador)...and is becoming a military state largely because of our presence."

The next Lou Douglas Lecture on Public Affairs is scheduled for March 5 with Efrain Diaz, a representative to the Honduran Congress and member of the Christian Democratic Party there. Diaz has a master's degree in agricultural economics from K-State.

said Americans should take care not to expect too much.

"We must be mindful that in Central America, in any developing country, perhaps we expect too much in the way of democratic process," she said. "The people have been part of an autocratic system for years. Our hopes for their elections are based on experiences with a country with a tradition of democracy from the very beginning."

Kassebaum said she foresees little Soviet policy change with Konstantin Chernenko's replacement of the late Yuri Andropov as Soviet premier.

"Chernenko represents leadership which has been a part of Soviet policy for many years. There will not be much change," she said. "They are undergoing a change of leaders, and we are holding a presidential election. This may lend an important stability."

Fine solution for overdue books

Some faculty have been abusing their privilege when checking out books from Farrell Library. The library should be complimented on the step it has taken toward solving the problem.

Faculty are able to check out books on an extended loan, a necessary privilege to conduct research and prepare class lectures.

But about 10,000 books checked out by faculty prior to Sept. 1, 1983 are still on loan. One librarian estimated that at least 50 professors have checked out more than 100 books each prior to September.

Some of these books have been checked out since the late 1960s and early 1970s and, as research material, may be out of date by now.

Faculty must be able to perform research, and considering the length of some projects, it is necessary for them to have books out for longer than the regular 30-day limit for undergraduate students.

But the abuse of this privilege is making it difficult for students and other professors who may also need such books — not to mention the librarians who have to deal with the problem.

With the new Automated Circulation System, faculty are prohibited from checking out additional materials if they have had a book checked out for 111 days, and they are billed for the book after 125 days.

Both the University of Kansas and Wichita State University fine faculty members if books are not returned on time. It is not unfair to suspend faculty members' right to check out another book if that privilege is abused.

If the library is going to let the faculty check out books for an extended period of time, the faculty should be required to renew the books once a semester.

Run-off deserves consideration

The run-off election for student body president is from 7:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. today in the Union. Students may vote for either Ken Heinz, junior in computer science, or Tracy Turner, junior in economics, to represent them during the coming school year.

The run-off election is one occasion where an individual's vote counts. Considering the fact that fewer than 2,000 students will vote today, each vote carries the potential force to make a difference in the outcome of the race. But how many students will bother to vote?

Many students don't care one way or another about Student Senate, choosing to ignore both elections and legislation. Of course, the amount of importance attached to a Senate seat is debatable, but Senate is responsible for allocating approximately $800,000 of student fees. This alone merits consideration.

But more concern and interest should be demonstrated regarding the office of student body president. Apart from Senate action, the president is the direct representative of students to University administration, alumni and visitors. He represents the image of the student body and often makes the first impression others receive of K-State students.

If only to ensure having a pleasing student representative, let alone a capable and competent student leader, the run-off election for student body president is worthy of consideration. Today students have the choice between two candidates who have both demonstrated the desire, energy and enthusiasm to serve as student body president. What remains to be seen is if enough students care about how they are represented on campus and throughout the state to choose between the candidates and vote today.

The tradition continues...

"Spanning the globe to bring you the finest in sports television from Sarajevo to Los Angeles — the thrill of victory and the agony of defeat. Recognized around the world as the leader in sports coverage, KCUF Sports: the tradition continues."

"Hello, everyone. I'm Bud Wiser along with Seymour Clouds here at Kansas State University in Manhattan, Kansas, to bring you live coverage via satellite of the 1984 Winter Games. Of course, we're speaking of the Greek Olympics."

"That's right, Bud. These fine and devoted athletes have been training all year to prepare for this grueling competition. But, Bud, you have to remember they couldn't have done it without some people who mean a lot to all of us."

"And who might that be, Seymour?"

"Why, mummy and daddy, of course."

"I should have guessed. Well, enough talk. Now let's get down to the business at hand. In our first event, those archrivals Lamma Bamma Gamma and Phi Upsilon Kappa go head to head in the quarters match. Now, here's Seymour with the play by play."

"Thanks, Bud. When the gun sounds, players on each team will toss a quarter into one of the ice-cold pitchers of Barbrau, the official beer of the Winter Games, and the ones who miss must chug the pitcher before play resumes."

"And they're off! Oops. Muffy Penobscott of the Lammass just missed the pitcher by inches. Meanwhile, the Phi Ups are holding onto the gold they won last year with stunning accuracy.

"Nearing the final gun now, and the Lammass look sick. All that beer they've downed is just incredible. The beer the Phi Ups have had to chug hasn't affected them in the least."

"And the match is over. The Phi Ups will take their places in the winners' circle for the awarding of the gold and the playing of 'Alma Mater,' if anyone can find a copy."

"Wow! That was really exciting, Seymour. I can't wait for our next event, which is really the decathlon of Greek Olympics: legal maneuvering."

"Now, in this event, each participant must run through the neighborhood surrounding his or her house carrying a portable stereo. The stereo must be playing the latest Stray Cats tape backward at 78 revolutions per minute and must emit no less than 120 decibels of sound. They must also stop and, er, water the petunias in someone else's yard. Midnight approaches. Here's Seymour."

"Thanks, Bud. One rule you declined to mention: Officer Longarm of the Riley County Police Department will be lurking around every corner trying to arrest the contestants. If one is arrested, he or she has 30 seconds to weasel out of the charges before City Prosecutor Bob Pottruff.

"Here they go!"

"Bad news, Bud. As you can hear in the background, sirens indicate that one of the contestants has been arrested. Oh, no. It's Muffy again. Guess that brew sort of got to her. Let's see what Pottruff says."

"Well, the charges have been dismissed. Muffy and her adviser have assured me that steps have been taken to see that this never happens again."

"OK, Bob. That means the 1984 Winter Games end in a draw. Muffy more than made up for her earlier mistake in the quarters contest and walked away with the gold for the Lammass. Now, here's Bud with a final word."

"Seymour, I think we have seen one of the finest sporting events ever at this school. Basketball ticket sales may be down, attendance at concerts may be minimal and enrollment may be going through the floor, but isn't it nice to see these nice young people taking part in such a worthy and entertaining event?"

"Certainly is, Bud. And isn't it nice to know there is support for this clean, wholesome activity?"

"You're talking about mummy and daddy again, Seymour?"

"No, I'm talking about municipal court."

"So long from Manhattan."

OH SURE, COMRADE... SOMEONE'S MAKING FACES AT US IN THE WINDOW...

Soviet leader's future affects all

"Comrade, wake up. He is dead."

What did the average Russian citizen think when the news of Yuri Andropov's death was announced? I've been thinking about this for quite a while. While Americans may never know what was said in private among Russians, the Soviet leadership probably doesn't know what its fellow countrymen thought and said behind closed doors.

I think there must be some infighting among the top Soviet leaders. Konstantin Chernenko, an old crony of the late Soviet premier Leonid Brezhnev, is now the leader of the Soviet Union. Chernenko, who took a "back seat" to Andropov during and after Brezhnev's funeral, lost his chance to succeed Brezhnev because of Andropov's ability to win support from top Soviet statesmen and politicians.

Chernenko didn't play a major role in Andropov's reign, even though he held the No. 2 position in Andropov's government. He kept a low profile. Now, after Andropov's death, Chernenko is in position to claim what he thought was rightfully his — Brezhnev's power and job.

Chernenko is 72 years old — the oldest man ever chosen to become general secretary of the Soviet Communist party. He has worked his way up the party's hierarchy to the top after serving under Brezhnev and Andropov.

I believe Chernenko's age will be his downfall. At 72, it is improbable that he will be able to rule for any length of time. Andropov ruled for only 15 months and died at the age of 69. Chernenko will be playing against the odds of nature. His chances of winning are at best slim.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

I think Chernenko will rule a maximum of three years.

If Chernenko does beat the odds, he will probably have an ideological war to settle. Younger bureaucrats are trying to increase their power; the "old guard" Politburo members will try to keep their power. Andropov wasn't in power long enough to solve this problem. Chernenko probably won't settle it either.

In the United States, there is a system to handle the problem of who succeeds the president if he dies in office. The vice president is first in line to become president upon the death, resignation or conviction of the president. The speaker of the House of Representatives becomes president if the vice president can't for one reason or another. If neither of them can take the office, the president pro tem of the Senate gets the nod.

The Soviet Union doesn't have such a system. It's open season when the premier dies. The aspiring candidate who can get the most support from party and Politburo members is the one who becomes the new premier.

An important aspect of being in charge in the Soviet system is the ability to control what information is released to the general public. Controlling the media is important. The masses must be told only what the leader wants. To do otherwise would corrupt the minds of the population with unimportant ideas, the party says.

Losing Andropov may be a bit of a shock to the Soviet public. The lack of stability in leadership in the Soviet Union will affect everyone.

Of major concern will be the Soviet military policy. Will the Soviets, under Chernenko, deploy more missiles in Eastern Europe and Asia? Will the Soviet military undertake any more "adventures" into neighboring countries, or will the Soviets pull out of Afghanistan? Chernenko will face some important decisions in negotiating with the United States on detente and working for a reduction of nuclear weapons in both countries.

The Soviet's domestic problems will pass from Andropov to Chernenko. He must find a way to increase worker productivity and product quality while fighting waste. No other Soviet leader has solved the country's economic problems; it is doubtful that Chernenko will have any luck in tackling this problem.

The next few months will be Chernenko's chance to prove what kind of leader he is. His reign can bring the world a step closer to peace, or it can end it in a nuclear nightmare. Everyone on this planet has a stake in Chernenko, whether we want to admit it or not. Let us hope he can live up to this responsibility.

Victims' rights raise questions

WASHINGTON — In Maryland, Kenneth Lodowski was convicted for the death of two men in the course of a robbery. One of the victims was an off-duty policeman who left a pregnant wife. The other victim, allegedly shot by a Lodowski accomplice now on trial, was an emigrant from Vietnam who left a grieving mother. The judge sentenced Lodowski to die. The crime, it turned out, was not just murder, but something worse — the murder of certain people.

The judge heard from both the widow and the mother before condemning Lodowski to death. Their testimony, although not then required, was in the spirit of a new law designed to ensure "victim's rights." And while there is no hard proof that their testimony convinced the judge that execution was warranted — after all, a policeman had been killed — it's hard to see how it could not.

Anyone who has read the testimony of the widow and the mother could not help but be moved by what they said. The widow was pregnant at the time her husband was shot and she gave birth two days after she testified. Her pregnancy was extended, apparently by psychological strain, and she carried past her ninth month.

As for the mother, her testimony was equally compelling. Her son had been the very model of the industrious emigrant. He was a store clerk, working his way up, putting in long hours, saving his money — doing in America what he could not do in Vietnam. He was, in short, a good man. And so concluded the judge.

"You participated in a tragedy that snuffed out the lives of two beautiful people," he told Lodowski. If ever there was justice, this seemed like it. But if ever there was a question about the whole victim's rights movement, this seems the case to raise it. If you believe in the death penalty, Lodowski certainly seems an appropriate candidate. But if you believe also that no life is worth less — or more — than another, this case is a troubling one.

RICHARD COHEN
Columnist

What would have happened if Lodowski had shot a corrupt cop? What would have happened if the cop he shot had lived alone, had no friends or relatives and had been disliked? What would have happened if one of the persons shot had been a drug pusher out on parole or maybe had recently escaped from a prison? How about a drifter?

In none of those cases would someone have been able to testify to their good character. In some of these cases, in fact, there would have been no one at all to testify. Does that mean that the life of someone who lives alone is worth less than the life of a man who leaves a family? Does this mean, in fact, that people will be punished not just for the crime they commit, but also for which victims they happen to choose? Kill a cop who is about to be a father and you get the gas chamber; kill a drifter and you get a life sentence — and the chance of parole.

The trouble is that in each and every case, someone has been killed. And in each and every case, we are dealing with a killer. What matters is the crime, not the relative worth of the victims or those who survive them. The plight of the survivors is real and so is their anguish, but it does not change the nature of the crime. If the off-duty policeman had abandoned his wife to live with 11 cheerleaders, that would not change the fact that a man had been killed.

Nevertheless, the so-called victim's rights movement is gaining ground. The phrase has a satisfying sound to it, but like "right to life" and other phrases concocted out of intellectual cotton candy, it is essentially meaningless. Worse, the phrase "victim's rights" suggests vengeance. That might be satisfying, but it is hardly justice. Justice requires that all people be treated equally before the law.

From all the evidence, Kenneth Lodowski is the sort of man-beast who ought to spend the rest of his life behind bars. But his crime was murder — not the murder of a good person, or a bad person, or a married person, but a person. "All men are created equal," says the Declaration of Independence. Ah yes, says the victim's rights movement, parroting George Orwell's "Animal Farm," but some are more equal than others. Orwell was spoofing communist society. The victim's rights movement is in deadly earnest.

Expert says evacuation plans adequate

By The Associated Press

EMPORIA — A government specialist testified Tuesday that evacuation plans appear to be adequate for the people living near the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant who would need help in the event of an emergency.

Mary Marlee Carroll, a technological hazards specialist for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, testified before the Atomic Safety and Licensing Board, which resumed hearings Tuesday after taking two weeks of testimony at Burlington and Emporia last month.

Carroll cited a time study by a private firm estimating that 330 people would need assistance with transportation to get out of the area during an emergency — hospital patients, nursing home residents, children in some schools and others without their own transportation. The study showed they could be evacuated within 2½ hours even under adverse weather conditions.

Carroll told the board's three administrative judges Tuesday that Coffey County officials will conduct a survey to obtain a more precise figure on the number of people who would need help.

Even if the survey finds more than 330 people needing help, she said, there is enough excess bus capacity to handle the extra people.

Carroll said arrangements should be made for people unable to get to the collection points where they would be picked up by buses.

"It's my understanding that that's being provided. Through the survey they would know the extent that people would require transportation," she said.

The hearings were scheduled after the license application for Wolf Creek, which is under construction near Burlington in east-central Kansas, was challenged by two women who live within 10 miles of the plant.

The women — Wanda Christy and Mary Ellen Salava — contend emergency plans in the event of an accident at the plant are inadequate.

The hearing panel will make a recommendation to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission on the license application after hearing the testimony. The hearings were originally scheduled to last through Feb. 23, but attorneys said Tuesday that they expect to conclude testimony this week.

The $2.67 billion plant is being built by Kansas Gas & Electric, Kansas City Power & Light Co. and the Kansas Electric Power Cooperative Inc.

Residence halls plan Spring Fling events

Spring Fling, a week-long celebration sponsored by the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls, will offer students living in residence halls an opportunity to close their books and relax by participating in a variety of activities.

Spring Fling is scheduled for April 8-15, said Mark Porter, Spring Fling chairman and freshman in pre-professional secondary education. This year, activities include a bed race, scavenger hunt, road rally, free all-night movies, casino night, a leadership banquet and TGIF festivities at local drinking establishments.

Porter said the Spring Fling planning committee chose events for this year which have been enjoyed in previous years.

"The bed race seems to be the most popular event in terms of attendance," Porter said.

Students interested in participating in Spring Fling events will be able to sign up at their residence halls, Porter said.

also a spokesman for the Americans in the multinational force, said the Ricketts fired 11 rounds from its five-inch guns before dawn on Syrian-held territory, at the request of the Lebanese command.

The shelling at nightfall was the fourth U.S. naval bombardment since President Reagan announced a week ago his decision to increase U.S. air and naval action against units firing into the Beirut area or attacking the peacekeeping force.

In Washington, Navy Secretary John Lehman said such shelling was intended to bolster the beleaguered government of President Amin Gemayel. But presidential spokesman Larry Speakes said Lehman was "incorrect," and that Naval fire was only to support Marines and other Americans in Lebanon.

The Druse surprise attack dealt the Lebanese army its second defeat in nine days. Allied Shiite Moslem militias took control of Moslem west Beirut on Feb. 6 after a series of street battles.

The Marine base at the airport was hit by mortars from the southeast at 6:45 a.m., and the Marines answered with a 36-round barrage of 81mm mortars, Giese said. Five hours earlier, rockets hit the terminal area of the Marine encampment, but there was no response.

Christian-controlled radio stations in Beirut said the Ricketts blasted Druse strongholds that had been given artillery support for the Druse offensive to capture the corridor.

Nabih Berri, leader of the Shiite militia, Amal, called the firing "a big mistake" and urged a U.S. neutral role in Lebanon.

Alumni coliseum donations surpass $5 million milestone

Fund-raising for the coliseum has surpassed the $5 million mark toward a goal of a least $7 million in contributions from alumni and friends of K-State.

The fund-raising campaign to raise $7 million will provide approximately 44 percent of the construction costs for the structure, while another 44 percent will come from student fees. The remaining 12 percent will be contributed by the K-State Athletic Department.

"With $5 million in the hopper, I believe we are in a good position," Fred Bramlage, national chairman of the fund-raising effort, said. "We are in the process of organizing scores of alumni volunteers to present our case to potential donors in communities throughout Kansas."

With approximately two months left in the campaign, Bramlage said he is confident the goal will be surpassed.

"We are currently concentrating on gifts in the $5,000 to $25,000 range. We are reminding prospective donors that under the athletic department's priority seating plan, gifts in that range would qualify them for chairback seating in the new coliseum," said Art Loub, executive vice president of the KSU Foundation.

The campaign is currently in the third and fourth phases of the total five phases of the fund-raising drive.

"One of the gratifying aspects of the campaign is that we've had many people ask why they have not been contacted," Loub said. "That's indicative of the degree of enthusiasm with which this campaign has been met throughout the state."

Women pucker up to kiss poster

LOS ANGELES — Actor Tom Selleck wasn't even there, but women lined up on Hollywood Boulevard to kiss him, or at least a bigger-than-life poster of the star of "Magnum P.I."

The 10-foot poster of Selleck's face — his mustache was about four feet wide — was a promotion for his new movie, "Lassiter," which opens Friday. About 50 women, young and old, showed up for the Valentine's Eve contest.

Selleck was busy filming his TV series in Hawaii.

Several women left their lipstick prints on the poster.

Contestants were judged on enthusiasm, placement, moistness and voluptuousness of their kisses. Promotional T-shirts, publicity photos and free movie passes were awarded to the winners, who turned out to be anyone who entered.

"My aim's off. This is so embarrassing, I can't stand it," said Deanna Dube of Torrance, Calif., after leaving a distinctive red kiss halfway across Selleck's eye.

Cancer victims stage fund-raiser

LONG BEACH, Calif. — Two young boys have raised $4,800 from friends and neighbors with a minimarathon to help battle a disease that has struck both of them — bone cancer.

Stan Miller, 12, and Marc Dortch, 7, had planned a jog-a-thon to raise funds for their treatment and for the Jonathan Jaques Children's Cancer Center, but they decided on a bike-a-thon instead because it would be less exhausting.

Marc, who checked out of the center at Memorial Hospital to attend Monday's event, found the biking too strenuous and walked instead.

More than 50 people showed up at Rossmoor Park to make good on their pledges while Stan and Marc pedaled and walked one lap.

The event "will help kids like me and Marc who have cancer to get well," said Stan, his hair just beginning to grow back after radiation treatments.

The average donation was $5, said Stan's mother, Margaret Miller.

"One of my goals is to be done with cancer forever. I've licked it already, I think," said Stan, who hopes to become an Eagle Scout and to return to school in May.

Sarajevo restaurant forced to close

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — A restaurant has been closed for five months after charging actor Kirk Douglas and his guests 10 times the correct amount for a meal, authorities said Tuesday.

According to Vecerjne Novine, a newspaper in this city hosting the Olympics, Fahrudin Sahic, owner of the downtown Una restaurant, was overly enthusiastic when he saw Douglas and seven friends walk in last Thursday.

The bill came to 54,000 dinars, or about $443, a considerable sum in this country where good dinners generally cost $10-$20 a person. It should have been 5,400 dinars, authorities said.

In addition, Fahrudin asked that the bill be paid in dollars. Such hard-currency payments are illegal here.

The incident was reported by a Yugoslav woman who was in the party. A city inspector ordered the restaurant closed the next day and a magistrate ordered it closed for five months.

Douglas was away from his hotel Tuesday and unavailable for comment.

Argentines view horror of past 7 years

By The Associated Press

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — Argentines only now are learning in gruesome detail about the deadly repression they lived with in the late 1970s, a dark time whose brutalities were shielded by censorship and by people's unwillingness to believe.

In seven years of military government that ended in December, Argentine television aired nothing critical of the ruling generals. But today the late-night news often resembles a horror movie, with graveside scenes of bones exhumed from secret burial grounds, tragic testimony to the military's systematic extermination of its real or imagined enemies.

There are 10,000 documented cases of Argentines who vanished after being arrested in the years following the 1976 military takeover, says author Ernesto Sabato, who heads a commission named by Argentina's new, democratically elected president, Raul Alfonsin, to investigate the fate of the "desaparecidos" — the disappeared ones.

Sabato says there may be up to 20,000 additional undocumented cases.

For years, such human rights activists as Adolfo Perez Esquivel, winner of the 1980 Nobel Peace Prize, sought to impress on the Argentine public the scale of the repression going on around them.

The military rulers denounced these accounts of torture and executions as part of an "international communist campaign" to smear Argentina. The news media — either docile, intimidated or willingly cooperative — disseminated this official version. The public doubted the stories the dissidents told.

Today, as President Alfonsin tries to shed light on 1970s repression, Argentine journalists seek out Esquivel and others who can attest to the excesses. Esquivel, for one, was jailed for 14 months without charge in 1977-78 and was beaten by his interrogators.

The generals took power in March 1976, ousting President Isabel Peron, widow of former President Juan Peron, for alleged corruption.

They then launched a bloody crackdown against two leftist guerrilla groups, the Montoneros and People's Revolutionary Army. But armed militants were not the only ones swept up in the dragnet. Thousands of alleged leftist sympathizers — union activists, leftist party members, intellectuals — also were seized and disappeared.

The military gave way to civilian rule in elections last October, and Argentines chose Alfonsin as their president. Leader of the social democratic Radical Party, he also helped found the Argentine Perma-ment Assembly for Human Rights in 1975.

After his inauguration Dec. 10, he declared, "The establishment of a state of law demands that those who in the recent past have sown terror, pain and death throughout Argentine society be judged."

The new president ordered that nine retired generals and admirals, who had formed three of Argentina's recent juntas, be tried by court martial on charges of human rights abuse. A half-dozen other former

Custom cutters' favor tax removal

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A group of "custom cutters" called on a Senate committee Tuesday to revise Kansas law to remove property taxes from farm machinery used in the commercial cutting of grain.

"Twenty years ago the majority of custom harvesters were based out of Kansas. Today this is not the case as most have relocated to states with more favorable tax structures," said Richard Farris of Edson, who operates a custom harvesting business in Sherman County.

He and several others, including two senators, urged the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee to endorse a bill which would remove property taxes from farm equipment used in "custom cutting" or harvesting. Supporters of the measure complained that existing law was not enforced equally and some custom cutters were not paying Kansas property taxes on their machinery.

Currently, farm equipment is not subject to property taxes if it is used exclusively for farming and ranching operations. However, that does not include custom cutters, people who harvest grain for hire, and a Shawnee County District Court judge recently ruled that equipment owned by commercial grain harvesters is subject to taxation.

"What we're trying to do is provide a little order to the chaos," said Sen. Richard Gannon, D-Goodland, who sponsored the bill with Sen. James Francisco, D-Mulvane.

Francisco said he was "shocked" by the different tax treatment of custom cutting equipment in various counties. Under the law, county appraisers decide whether taxes should be levied on an individual's farm equipment.

Farris said there were more than 200 combines in Sherman County, but only six — four of which he owns — were subject to the property tax last year. He said many farmers in the county "do some custom work with a large number of them custom harvesting more acres than they harvest on their own land." His property tax bill on the four combines this year came to $6,732.

Jack McCreery of Clearwater, who has been a custom harvester for 27 years, recounted similar stories about the taxing of farm equipment — with some individuals exempted even though they do custom cutting.

"What it boils down to is I'm being penalized because I list my combine on the tax rolls," said McCreery.

Sam Smith of Newton, the Harvey County appraiser, agreed there were problems with the farm machinery law.

"You have an unfair, unequal tax situation at this time," said Smith.

State accepts federal EDB levels

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas has adopted the federal Environmental Protection Agency's recommended acceptable levels of ethylene dibromide (EDB) in grain and food, at least for the time being, the governor's office revealed Tuesday.

The office released a report by a cabinet subcommittee appointed by Gov. John Carlin to study the concerns over EDB being used as a fumigant for grain storage and milling equipment.

That report concluded Kansas should adopt the EPA's recommendations while continuing to assess them "to determine whether those levels are the appropriate standards for Kansas, or if more stringent standards are necessary."

It also said the state has begun a program of testing grain and processed food products, with 50 samples submitted so far for analysis.

Two grain samples from Wichita which were tested were found to have "no detectable levels of EDB," the report said.

The EPA has approved levels of 900 parts per billion for raw grain, 150 parts per billion for intermediate level products such as flour, and 30 parts per billion for processed foods.

Besides adopting the EPA levels on EDB, the subcommittee decided to ask manufacturers and distributors to recall supplies of the fumigant, notify grain elevators and mill operators of the suspension of EDB for certain uses, start sampling intermediate and processed foods to determine the EDB levels, and ask processors to recall voluntarily those products found to exceed the acceptable levels.

If the processors do not comply voluntarily with the recalls, the subcommittee recommended invoking mandatory compliance measures.

Milling industry seeks insecticide alternatives

By TERRI BAIRD and LINDA MORRELL
Collegian Reporters

Ethylene dibromide (EDB) has been on the minds of politicians, farmers and housewives since the banning of the grain fumigant two weeks ago.

On Feb. 4, the Environmental Protection Agency announced an immediate suspension of EDB use for bulk stored grain fumigation and the spot treatment of milling machinery.

For Kansas farmers, this means that all usage of fumigants containing any concentration of EDB has been stopped. It also means that farm suppliers will not be able to sell EDB products.

The EDB ban has affected the grain and milling industry. Dean Garwood, director of entomology for the State Board of Agriculture, said:

Grain elevators are changing the way they're treating grains, he said. Alternative pesticides include methabromide and carbon disulfide. Each fumigant has certain advantages, he said.

The ban is not hurting grain exports, but citrus and tropical fruits exports are affected, Garwood said.

The Kansas Wheat Commission has been monitoring the situation closely since the ban and doesn't consider it a problem, David Frey, a commission assistant administrator, said.

Canada banned the use of EDB six years ago, so the country may try to say that it's been more careful with its grains than the United States in the market, Frey said.

Kansas officials, however, are expressing concern about the EPA's decision to ban EDB as a fumigant for grains.

Republican senators Nancy Kassebaum and Robert Dole sent a letter to EPA Administrator William Ruckelshaus about the impact of the administration's decision.

Kassebaum is concerned about the connection of EDB and public health, Greg Musil, legislative assistant to the senator, said.

"The problem is that we don't know exactly how much has been treated, either directly or contaminated," Musil said.

No grain will have to be destroyed. EDB is a volatile compound which quickly decomposes. The raw grains that have higher concentrations can be aerated, aged or used as cattle feed to get below the maximum recommended level, Bob Schoeff, professor of grain science, said.

"We don't anticipate any problem in Kansas," Schoeff said. "They're making a mountain out of a molehill."

Although no grain food products have been removed from the shelves in Kansas, some batches may be removed in the future, Musil said.

"Who knows at what levels EDB effects a person? It varies from individual to individual," said Bob Moody, information officer for the Department of Health and Environment.

"Ruckelshaus had the right approach when he banned it (EDB)," Moody said.

EDB has been registered as a pesticide in the United States since the late 1940s. It's use as a soil fumigant for nematode control constituted the greatest pesticide usage, until this use was banned in late 1983.

More important to Kansas farmers was its use as an ingredient in certain bulk stored grain fumigants and spot fumigants for eliminating difficult-to-reach infestations in equipment operated by the milling industry.

The recommended levels which the EPA has set are guidelines the states may use to adopt their own levels. Until other guidelines can be set, the Kansas Legislature adopted the EPA guidelines Tuesday. These are: raw grain intended for human consumption may not exceed 900 parts per billion; intermediate level products, including flour, soft cereal and mixes for products which must be baked prior to consumption should have less than 150 parts per billion; ready-to-eat products including snacks, brans and baked goods should have less than 30 parts per billion.

H. Leroy Brooks, professor of entomology extension, said Gov. John Carlin has assigned a special task force to determine levels for the state. The task force is under the Department of Health and Environment and should have guidelines set sometime next week.

Dr. Joe Hollowell, health director for the Department of Health and Environment, said he knows of no serious EDB residue problems in Kansas food.

"It is unfortunate it is being suspended," Brooks said. "Under the circumstance the alarm created, it was more expedient for the EPA to suspend its use."

"There is a big concern when high levels go on for a period of time,"

Illustration by Alice Disney

Brooks said, "Are we sure it is not a problem? It is unrealistic not to have some actionable level."

Randall Higgins, assistant professor of entomology, said he has participated in a study that showed less than 5 percent of the wheat in Kansas was treated with EDB last year. A maximum of 20.7 million bushels of wheat could have been exposed to EDB in the past year, but, Higgins said, the figure was probably much less. The loss of EDB will probably not affect Kansas and its stored grain.

Outside of Kansas, at least one environmental group is considering a lawsuit to force the EPA to take even stronger action against EDB. The Natural Resources Defense Council proposes that the steps taken by the EPA do not assure the chemical will be kept out of food products.

The Proctor & Gamble Co., whose Duncan Hines cake mixes have been banned in many states, is happy with the EPA's decision. According to an Associated Press release, the company's officials believe it will help end the confusion about company products.

Disease transmission reduced by tags

Earmarking decreases face fly numbers

By TODD NIGHSWONGER
Collegian Reporter

For many years, two varieties of flies — face flies and horn flies — have posed a problem for pasture cattle farmers. Recently horn flies have built up a resistance to insecticide, making them difficult to control.

Alberto Broce, associate professor of entomology, is heading research on how to control these flies while limiting their resistance to insecticide.

The two types of flies transmit diseases among cows or irritate the cattle so much that reduced weight gain occurs. This has led to economic problems for the cattlemen because they rely on healthy cattle to bring a good market price.

Since the mid 1970s, however, the use of insecticide-impregnated ear tags to control the number of flies has greatly reduced the problem, Broce said.

Before approaching the problem and its solution, an understanding of some background information is necessary, Broce said.

Face flies, so named because they land on cattle's faces and go directly to their eyes to feed on eye secretion, which supplies protein to form the flies' eggs.

"They have structures in the mouth that cause damage to the eye by rasping with tiny teeth," Broce said. This causes irritation of the tissue in and around the eye.

When the flies feed, they may transmit a disease from another cow, he said.

"Feeding on the eye predisposes the cattle to the entry of pathogens," he said. Pathogens are specific causes of diseases.

One ailment is pink eye, an acute eye inflammation caused by bacteria. Eye worms and a virus also may be contracted. A fourth problem, nematode worms, create a green muscle disease in which the animal must be destroyed. It has not been a problem in the United States, however.

Face flies light on cattle only at feeding time, which occurs one to three times a day for a few minutes. Usually one to 15 flies feed on a cow at a time.

Because these flies prefer more moisture than is present in the dry areas of Kansas, they only cause a problem in the eastern part of the state, Broce said.

Horn flies stay on the body of their hosts continuously and often collect in groups exceeding 500.

Horn flies, which carry no diseases, have mouth parts which pierce the cattle's skin and suck blood.

"This irritates the cattle to the point where they reduce weight gain," he said. "For example, instead of gaining two pounds a day, a cow only gains a pound and a half."

During the growing season of 180 days, each animal would gain 90 pounds less than during a normal season, he said.

The piercing of skin annoys the cattle enough to cause them to go into the woods, into water or to congregate and stay in one area to keep the flies away. These actions result in improper grazing and a reduction in weight gain.

The ear tags, developed by Tom Harvey, a former K-State professor, are "one of the best methods (of fly control) that we have today," Broce said. The tags contain pyrethroid, an insecticide harmless to animals.

But the insecticide's effectiveness among the two varieties of flies is not the same, he said.

According to Broce, because face flies are only on cattle at feeding time, they are difficult to control since they're not in contact with the insecticide for a prolonged period. Since the flies collect around the eye, a vital organ, only a small amount of insecticide can be used. The end result is about an 80 percent control of the flies.

Horn flies can be controlled almost 100 percent of the time for three reasons, he said.

These flies are easier to kill because they spend all of their time on the animals and receive increased exposure to the insecticide. In addition, more insecticide can be used because the flies don't collect near any vital organs.

Horn flies also move from animal to animal at a high rate, so fewer cattle must be tagged.

Pyrethroid is released slowly and spread when the tag rubs against the face, head or back of the cattle. The horn flies move around on the cattle's bodies and eventually come into contact with enough insecticide to kill them.

The rate of control for both flies relates to the behavior of the type of fly, the amount of insecticide used and where the flies collect on the animal, Broce said. Tags also can be attached to the cow's tail.

Horn flies pose a larger problem throughout Kansas, and the explanation behind this is the basis of Broce's research.

"Every time man has brought insecticide to control insects, they (insects) have become resistant to the insecticide," he said. "It is my strong belief that no matter what chemicals we use, they (the flies) will become resistant eventually."

That statement has proven true in Kansas. Horn flies have become resistant to pyrethroid in many areas of the state. At Barnes in Washington County, the flies have become extremely resistant to the insecticide.

Through his research, Broce has learned that when very few flies remain, as in the case of the nearly 100 percent control of the horn flies, the small number that survive have obtained a high concentration of genes resistant to the insecticide.

The next generation of these flies is then more resistant, and the resistance increases with each new breeding. Eventually all the flies in the given area become resistant.

Changing insecticides won't work, Broce said, because the flies would develop a cross-resistance between insecticides.

He said many farmers reported last summer that the ear tags were less than satisfactory or provided no control. An increase in resistance is anticipated.

"This coming summer we're going to have a lot of problems with the ear tags," Broce said.

A possible solution would be to manage the control of the horn flies by killing a smaller number of them, he said.

This might seem like the wrong answer, but Broce said he believes that this would increase the vulnerability of the flies to the insecticide.

He uses the percentage of controlled face flies as an example.

Although the face flies are controlled at a smaller percentage (80 percent), they have not become resistant to the insecticide, Broce said.

A situation thus results in which the horn flies need to be controlled while remaining susceptible to the insecticide.

This is a concept that insecticide producers have a hard time agreeing with, since their goal is to manufacture an insecticide to kill as many insects as possible, he said.

Implanted bull beef similar to steer meat

By LILLIAN ZIER
Collegian Reporter

Traditionally Americans have rejected the idea of consuming beef from bulls rather than steers, but a study conducted by members of the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry may begin a new trend.

"After cooking, bulls implanted from birth to slaughter were most preferred in overall eating satisfaction," Connie Pelton, graduate in animal sciences and industry, said.

Implantation is the process of giving feeder cattle growth promotants.

Fifty-five households were selected randomly from among K-State personnel. Steaks from steers, bulls implanted from birth to slaughter, bulls implanted from birth to weaning and bulls implanted from weaning to slaughter were distributed to the families. The families were not told what kind of steak they were evaluating and were asked to fill out a response sheet stating their visual preference after cooking. They were also asked to rate the steaks for tenderness, juiciness and flavor on an eight-point scale.

The results showed that meat from steer and bulls implanted from birth to slaughter was favored the most.

"The question we've been asking is, 'Does implanting effect consumer tastes?'" Pelton said. "In bulls implanted every 100 days, consumers basically couldn't tell the difference from steers."

The results also showed consumers visually preferred steer steaks to steaks from bulls implanted from birth to slaughter.

"Steer steaks are leaner. They are not as highly marbled. Consumers are probably associating marbling with fat," Pelton said. Another test was performed by a six-member panel of professors and graduate students trained in sensory analysis. They are more sensitive than most consumers, and they found little difference between meat from bulls implanted from birth to slaughter and meat from steers. All tests showed meat from bulls implanted from weaning to slaughter to be inferior, she said.

An objective test was performed by Warner Bratzler Shear Force Evaluation using a mechanical means of measuring tenderness. The results showed meat from bulls implanted later in life were tougher, she said.

Raising and marketing bull beef would be an advantage for both producers and consumers in terms of cost, Pelton said. Bulls compared to steers in the feed lot are more efficient because they convert grain to fat faster, she said. Bulls yield a trimmer carcass with less fat and more red meat.

"The marketing aspect is the major hang-up in merchandising bulls for slaughter," Gerry Kuhl, assistant professor of animal sciences extension, said.

Consumers don't accept bull beef because they view it as being of lesser quality than steer beef. It is an image they have established through time, Pelton said.

Kuhl said Fion Industries in Texas has its own feed lots and packing plants.

Raising bulls in the feed lot provides difficulties for the producers because they are more aggressive, Kuhl said.

"There is more fighting, stirring around in the pens and riding behavior. The producers find more wear and tear on the pens, fences and bunks," he said.

Implanting helps solve some of these behavior problems. "Implanting settles them down and makes them more steer-like," Pelton said.

Enrollment reporting date draws opposition

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — State community colleges and Washburn University in Topeka should not have to wait nine weeks for enrollment figures to determine out-district tuition and state aid, a House committee was told Tuesday.

"A higher education institution incurs costs for teaching students on the day the classes start," said Ed Walbourn, a lobbyist for Washburn. "To declare on the ninth week of a semester that a particular source of funding, for class time already taught, may no longer be available, amounts to a substantial setback to the funding of an institution."

Walbourn was testifying before the House Education Committee against a measure which would base payments of state aid and out-district tuition paid to Washburn University and community colleges on the number of students still enrolled after nine weeks.

State law now provides for those payments to be based on the number of students enrolled at the end of the fifth week of a semester.

The measure would also make the payment dates one month later than the dates now established in state law.

The committee took no action on the enrollment-reporting measure or on a measure it was considering which would increase student tuition at community colleges.

Fred Allen, a lobbyist for the Kansas Association of Counties, testified in support of the out-district tuition measure.

He said several county commissioners are upset because their counties are paying out-district aid for students who drop out of school.

"This would be a better bill if it provided for payment of tuition upon verified completion of courses,"

However, Merle Hill, executive director of the Kansas Association of Community Colleges, opposed the bill.

"Shouldn't a college be reimbursed for providing eight weeks of instruction for a duly enrolled student who becomes pregnant and, upon her doctor's advice, withdraws from a class or who is a part-time student and full-time worker and has his schedule changed?" Hill asked.

Hill and Walbourn also objected to changing the enrollment-reporting date for Washburn University and the state's 19 community colleges, while allowing the Kansas Board of Regents institutions to continue to use their enrollment figures from the fifth week of the semester.

"Students at the six regents universities would apparently, with impunity, continue to be able to drop classes after the fifth week, with no concomitant loss of funds for the universities," Hill said.

Walbourn said such a change would "impose double standards for public higher education — one for the regents institutions and one for the community colleges and Washburn University."

"This bill would penalize only selected institutions who accept students with a lower chance of being successful in their educational endeavors," he said.

Hill and Walbourn both said delaying the payments of state aid and out-state tuition would add to the "tight cash flow situation" at the community colleges and Washburn.

Hill also testified in favor of another measure the committee is considering which would increase student tuition at the state's community colleges to between $12 and $18 per credit hour.

State law now allows community colleges to charge students between $10 and $15 per credit hour for tuition.

"Tuition at our sister institutions, the six regents universities and Washburn University of Topeka, has increased significantly since 1980," Hill said. "In an attempt to keep tuition as low as possible, the community college boards have not requested an increase in four years."

"Increasing the tuition range by 20 percent will enable community college boards to engage more effectively in long-range fiscal planning for the next four or five years."

Argentina

high officials, including an ex-president, Gen. Reynaldo Bignone, have been indicted for alleged roles in specific cases of abduction and presumed murder.

The disclosures come almost daily.

In one case, Sabato, author of "Of Tombs and Heroes," has given to a federal judge in the provincial capital of Cordoba a ledger from that city's morgue with the names of 700 people said to have been buried clandestinely in a mass grave.

Morgue workers told the presidential commission the bodies, many mutilated by torture and most executed by gunfire, were delivered during 1976-77 by police and army officers who ordered morgue authorities to forgo legally required autopsies, Sabato reported.

He said the bodies were sent to the San Vicente Cemetery, usually at night, where they were thrown into a 120-by-24-foot pit and covered over until, after two years, the grave gradually was filled.

Scores of bodies have been exhumed from "NN" — No Name — sections of a dozen cemeteries in Buenos Aires and the provinces in recent weeks. Rights organizations claim most are the remains of victims of the repression, and say thousands were buried in these anonymous plots. Others reportedly were thrown from military planes into the Atlantic hundreds of miles offshore.

In a "confession" to the weekly magazine La Semana, former navy petty officer Raul Vilarino said that as a member of "Task Group 3," working out of the Navy school in a Buenos Aires suburb, he engaged in abductions and executions.

He denied participating in torture but described techniques he said he witnessed — including use of an instrument that sent 220-volt electrical current through the victim, and the "submarine" technique, in which the suspect's head was held under water to the point of drowning. The retired navy man's statements could not otherwise be verified.

The testimony of victims is on file with the rights groups, and now with the Sabato commission.

One, Graciela Geuna, said that as a student activist in 1976 she was detained and tortured at an army-run clandestine jail called "The Pearl" in Cordoba. Out of an estimated 2,000 prisoners who passed through the camp, she said, she and only about 40 others survived, through collaboration and luck.

Earlier this month, she said in a telephone interview with a Buenos Aires radio station that Gen. Luciano Menendez, then commander of the Cordoba-based Third Army Corps, personally supervised firing squad executions. The executions "were carried out with an absurdly solemn pomp in an effort to keep up the troops' morale," she said.

Hamilton holds top position

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — Scott Hamilton, heavily favored for an Olympic figure skating gold medal, stayed ahead Tuesday despite losing the men's short program to Canada's Brian Orser.

Ice dancers Jayne Torvill and Christopher Dean of Britain won the gold medal Tuesday night at Zetra Arena, while the American couple of Judy Blumberg and Michael Seibert slipped from the third spot and finished fourth.

Jean-Christophe Simond of France remained second overall behind Hamilton and West German Rudi Cerne was third. The order was unchanged from Monday's compulsory event.

Brian Boitano, 20, of Sunnyvale, Calif., skated strongly in the short program — which counts 20 percent of the total score — for a third-place finish. He moved up from eighth place after school figures to sixth overall.

The other U.S. entry, Mark Cockerell of Los Angeles, was 17th overall. He finished 17th in the short program and was 18th after figures. Hamilton, 25, of Denver, skated all the required jumps in the two-minute short program, but his camel spin was slow and he lacked his usual verve.

"The camel wasn't what I quite wanted it to be," said the three-time world champion, who came close to banging into the corner walls on one trip around the rink.

His marks ranged from 5.7 to 5.9s from the nine judges. The U.S. judge gave him 5.9 of a possible 6.0 for both required elements and presentation.

"Every now and then I'll lose the short. It's kind of a test of nerves," Hamilton said.

He said he had a poor warmup and that he had been distracted by following all the other events at the Games and didn't concentrate on the short program.

"I got on the ice and all of a sudden — bam, Olympics, short program, do or die and people are yelling my name. So I started to get excited," he said.

"So it was calm down. Let's

Swiss skier wins gold in men's giant slalom

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — Switzerland's Max Julen, often a runner-up in World Cup races, held off crowd favorite Jure Franko of Yugoslavia to win the gold medal Tuesday in men's giant slalom at the XIV Olympic Winter Games.

Julen, 22, prevailed on a treacherous course that claimed two of the favorites on the first run. Franko settled for the silver medal — the first medal ever won by Yugoslavia in Winter Olympics — and Andreas Wenzel of Liechtenstein took the bronze.

Phil Mahre of Yakima, Wash., the three-time World Cup overall champion who has struggled all season, wound up eighth. His brother Steve was 17th. Tiger Shaw of Stowe, Vt., the other American in the competition, fell early in his first run.

The giant slalom was marked by the absence of two of the event's strongest competitors, Sweden's In-gemar Stenmark and Luxembourg's Marc Girardelli. Stenmark has been barred from competing because he accepted endorsement money directly, and Girardelli, an Austrian, doesn't have citizenship in Luxembourg.

Of his victory, Julen said, "I can't believe it. It will take time to get used to it."

The giant slalom was held over a Mount Bjelasnica course of roughly 1,222 yards with a vertical drop of roughly 417 yards over the course.

Julen has won just one World Cup race in his three seasons on the circuit, but he has been highly competitive. Last year he finished second five times.

Julen was the first-run leader, with a time of 1 minute, 20.54 seconds, just one-tenth of a second faster than Wenzel. Franz Gruber of Austria was third in 1:21.03, and Franko was fourth in 1:21.15. Phil Mahre ranked 10th after the run.

remember what we're out here for and skate a clean short program."

Asked if he can be beaten for the gold, Hamilton's coach, Don Laws, said confidently: "No, they won't touch him."

"He'd have to be fifth in freeskating and he's never been below first" in 15 straight championships, Laws said.

Orser, who was fifth overall after finishing seventh in figures, skated with flair and impressed the judges with his presentation.

Dressed in tiger stripes and skating to a medley from the musical "Cats," he opened strongly with a difficult triple lutz-double loop combination jump and skated the other requirements for a strong finish.

Except for one 5.7 in both required elements and presentation from the Yugoslav judge, Orser received all 5.8s of a possible 6.0.

Doctor says Leonard should retire

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — The doctor who operated on Sugar Ray Leonard's right eye said Tuesday it will be two weeks before the boxer can start training again for his postponed comeback match. But Dr. Edward Ryan also said he doesn't think Leonard should fight at all.

"I wouldn't recommend that he fight, but if the eye heals up properly I could not prevent him from fighting," said Ryan, a retinal specialist at the Massachusetts Eye and Ear Infirmary.

Ryan operated on the former welterweight champion Monday, after a checkup showed the retina in his right eye was becoming loose.

"Sugar Ray tolerated the procedure very well," said Ryan, who had never examined the boxer before. "His eye will be a little sore."

Ryan said Leonard's left eye, operated on in 1982, is fine but without the surgery in his right eye, the boxer could not have fought safely against Kevin Howard Feb. 25. The match has been postponed and no new date has been announced.

Leonard was resting in the Washington area, and the secretary of Mike Trainer, his lawyer, said there would be no statement until the end of the week and no new conference was scheduled.

The 27-year-old fighter had surgery on his left eye in May 9, 1982, to repair a partly detached retina and retired from boxing the following Nov. 9. He had a 32-1 record and was undisputed welterweight champion at the time.

On Dec. 10, Leonard announced his comeback against Howard at the Worcester Centrum.

"If his eye is bad and he can't fight, then God bless him," Howard said Monday night. "I have to step on. If we don't fight, give me another opponent."

Ryan said the routine procedure involved freezing part of the eye to form scar tissue that would make the retina adhere better. The surgery, performed under local anesthesia, took five or six minutes.

The doctor said he expected the eye to heal well, but Leonard would have to be examined before every fight to ward off trouble.

Asked when he thought Leonard could fight again, Ryan said "We'll have to see how his eye responds to the treatment."

"I don't think he was terribly discouraged" about the postponement, said Dan Doyle of KO Inc. of Hartford, Conn., who was to promote the fight. "He just thought it was important to take all precautions."

Leonard has said he's working toward a bout with undisputed middleweight champion Marvelous Marvin Hagler.

In an interview Monday, he said, "Everything is pretty much geared to the Leonard-Hagler fight. It should be one of the biggest in history and there is great public demand for it."

'Cats to look for revenge against Colorado tonight

The University of Colorado will square off against the K-State Wildcats in a Big Eight Conference basketball contest at 8:10 p.m. today at Ahearn Field House.

The Buffaloes enter the contest with a 4-4 conference mark and a 13-8 overall record. Colorado is currently tied with the University of Nebraska and Oklahoma State University for third place in the Big Eight.

CU's Jay Humphries led the team to victories over Iowa State University and Oklahoma State last week. The 6-foot-3 senior guard scored 17 points and dished out 10 assists against the Cyclones and added 16 points and 12 assists against the Cowboys.

Humphries is the Big Eight's ninth-leading scorer, with a 15.9 points-per-game average. He is followed closely by 6-foot-9 teammate Randy Downs, who holds down the 10th spot with a 14.8 points-per-game average.

The Buffaloes boast one of the conference's top rebounders in 6-foot-8 forward Alex Stivins, who is tied with the University of Oklahoma's Wayman Tisdale for the top spot in the conference with an average of 10.1 rebounds per game.

In the first meeting between the two schools, K-State opened a 10-point lead early in the game, but the Buffaloes cut the lead to three by halftime. The 'Cats eventually lost the game in Boulder, 74-66, as Downs' 14 points led four CU players who scored in double figures.

K-State was led by Ben Mitchell's career-high 21 points, and Eddie Elder chipped in with 10.

Heinz wins presidential run-off race

Staff/Allen Eystone

Ken Heinz, junior in computer science, listens in Haymaker Hall as a member of the Student Senate Elections Committee tells him the results of the student body presidential run-off election Wednesday. Heinz received 1,500 votes and Tracy Turner, junior in economics, received 942.

Ken Heinz, junior in computer science, and a group of supporters were gathered at Haymaker Hall when he received the call Wednesday night from the Student Senate Elections Committee notifying him that he was chosen the new K-State student body president.

"I just feel relieved and happy," Heinz said when he heard the news.

Heinz received 1,500 votes and Tracy Turner, junior in economics, received 942 in the run-off election.

A total of 2,450 votes were cast, compared with 3,423 in the general election. There were eight write-in votes, which were invalid in the run-off. Approximately 13 percent of the student body voted in the run-off election, compared with approximately 19 percent in the general election.

Heinz celebrated his victory quietly Wednesday.

"Hopefully I'll cheer the 'Cats on to victory and spend a quiet evening with friends," he said.

The new student body president will be officially sworn in March 8. Heinz and Jerry Katlin, current student body president and graduate in public administration, will attend the Board of Regents meeting in Topeka today.

"For the next couple of weeks, Jerry and I will be working together," he said. "He'll be showing me the ropes."

Improvement of campus lighting was the main issue in Heinz's campaign. He said he will begin work on proposals soon after taking office.

"I'll probably be working with the (K-State) Alumni Association on getting additional lighting," he said. "They have a meeting in May, and we hope to have a proposal."

Heinz currently is a staff assistant at Haymaker and said he will continue to work in a more limited capacity when he becomes student body president.

"I have talked with Thomas Frith, director of housing, and I'll still be a staff assistant," he said. "Instead of a full floor, I'll be in charge of one wing on the same floor I work on now. I don't foresee any big problems."

Fighters nearly encircle Marine base at airport

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Druse and Shiite militias swept the hills south of Beirut on Wednesday after routing the crumbling Lebanese army for the second time in nine days. Druse leader Walid Jumblatt said President Amin Gemayel should resign to be tried for "crimes."

A Druse offensive that drove the army from positions south of the capital left the U.S. Marines, based at Beirut's airport, almost surrounded by leftist Druse and Shiite Moslem fighters.

The Marines maintained access to the Mediterranean via a narrow strip, crossing the coastal highway, to a boat landing zone dubbed the "green beach." Spokesman Maj. Dennis Brooks said there was no fighting around the base.

The Druse fighters and Amal, the largest Shiite militia, joined along the coastal highway and made clean-up sweeps through the hills, picking up equipment abandoned by the Lebanese army and Christian militias who fled at the surprise offensive on Tuesday.

Police said 50 people were killed and 89 wounded in the fighting in the hills Tuesday and Wednesday. They said two people died and 14 were wounded in Beirut, where clashes continued along the "green line," the strip dividing Christian east and Moslem west Beirut.

Government sources said Gemayel was on the verge of meeting a key opposition demand by abrogating a May 17, 1983, troop withdrawal agreement with Israel. But he made no announcement Wednesday.

Jumblatt said rejection of the pact was no longer enough.

"Amin Gemayel has to step down," he said. "There will never be any talks, any dialogue, any reconciliation with the (rightist Christian) Phalangists or Amin Gemayel while he is in power."

"Gemayel may be trying to save his neck. There will be no mercy for him. He must be tried — he and the other officers, especially (Lebanese army chief Gen. Ibrahim) Tannous, for all the crimes they committed."

One "crime," he said, was calling in artillery support from the U.S. ships on "national areas" in the Syrian-held mountains.

In Washington, President Reagan said the Marines, to be withdrawn soon, could stay on the U.S. ships for as long as they would have been kept on shore — which could be another year or more.

Secretary of State George Shultz said the Marines, on their second-highest alert, were not in great danger at their base.

Britain already has removed its 115-man unit of the four-country force.

Underground nuclear blast injures scientists in Nevada

By The Associated Press

LAS VEGAS, Nev. (AP) — An underground nuclear test blast caused the earth more than one-fifth of a mile above to collapse Wednesday, injuring at least 12 atomic scientists whose trailers plunged into the hole.

One was critically injured, but no radiation escaped as a result of the accident, officials said.

The injured workers were in several trailers atop a flat-top desert mountain, checking instruments that recorded the blast, when the ground fell in as much as 30 feet, said U.S. Department of Energy spokesman Jim Boyer.

The accident occurred shortly after noon, three hours after a nuclear test code-named Midas Myth-Milagro was detonated in a tunnel 1,168 feet underground.

Despite the delay, "The collapse was a result of the test, yes," said DOE spokeswoman Grace Plummer.

An area about 60 feet wide and 150 feet long dropped between 10 and 30 feet, Boyer said.

Boyer said he didn't know if the blast tunnel itself had collapsed.

Increased drinking age proposals meet opposition, support

Proposals include banning of 'drink and drown' specials

From Staff and Wire Reports

TOPEKA — The sale of beer should be regulated the same as liquor with specific minimum prices set by the state to prevent bars from holding "drink and drown nights," a legislative committee was told Wednesday.

"As a former participant in those kinds of activities, I know what goes on," said Rep. Vic Miller, D-Topeka, and sponsor of the bill. "It's human nature — you try to get all you possibly can for your money. Nobody has to worry about anything, and they just drink, drink, drink until they drown."

"I think there is nothing socially redeeming about drink-and-drown promotions," he said.

Miller was speaking in support of a bill before the Kansas House Federal and State Affairs Committee which would make it illegal to sell an unlimited amount of beer for a set price.

"You don't have to reach into your pocket each time, so it doesn't hurt," Miller said. "There's no control over how much you drink. You can pour it on each other, have chugging contests and you don't have to worry about what goes on the floor."

The Associated Students of Kansas lobbying group supports legislation prohibiting "drink and drown" specials, Brett Lambert, K-State ASK campus director and sophomore in pre-law, said.

"When people pay something like a $4 cover charge, they are getting ripped off," he said. "Most people aren't drinking their money's worth. The minority who drink more than their $4 worth are dangerous if they drive home. 'Drink and drown' nights encourage irresponsible drinking."

The bill would have little effect other than ending "drink and drown" nights, Lambert said.

"This bill would not prohibit beer specials," he said. "When you take the total cost of beer to the bar and divide by the number it serves — it comes out to about 10 cents a draw. They won't be selling for less than cost."

The panel also heard testimony on a bill that would extend legal liability for death and injury to anyone who supplies beer or liquor to a minor who gets drunk and has a car wreck.

Vic Miller also testified in favor of a proposal, which he also sponsored, to extend liability when minors get drunk and cause damage or death, especially in traffic accidents.

"It's not just the minor who should be punished for his intoxication," Vic Miller said. "Punishment should be brought to bear on the person who originally broke the law and sold that minor alcohol," he said.

And Vic Miller pointed the finger of blame in several areas, including liquor store owners, bartenders and parents. He said all should be held liable if they give liquor to young people.

In addition, the ASK, the Kansas Trial Lawyers Association, Kansas For Life At Its Best!, and the Kansas County and District Attorneys Association registered their support for the bill, which is similar to a so-called dram shop bill which was killed last session.

The new proposal is different from the dram shop measure because it is limited to minors who get drunk and kill someone or destroy property in a wreck. Last year's dram shop proposal was much broader and would have extended liability to a bartender who served alcohol to anyone who gets drunk and has a wreck.

Aggieville bar owners oppose raising age to buy beer

By LUCY REILLY
Collegian Reporter

(Editor's note: This is the first of two articles about local reaction to three bills currently being considered in the Kansas Legislature relating to alcoholic consumption in the state. The second will deal with opposition to the bills.)

Three bills in the legislature which would raise the drinking age to 21, eliminate "drink and drown" nights or allow beer drinking only in taverns for 18- to 20-year-olds, are meeting much opposition in Manhattan.

The proposals could play a prominent role in the demise of several Aggieville bars.

Fred Lechner, owner of the Sports Fan-atic, 1216 Laramie St., said he doesn't think passage of the bills will create the situation the Kansas Legislature is seeking in considering the bills — preventing alcohol-related traffic deaths. If the drinking age is raised to 21, it would cause more young people to drink in their cars, only worsening the situation, he said.

"People need a more controlled atmosphere, such as a bar, in which to drink," Lechner said. "I feel beer bought at a convenience store is more damaging than drinking on-premises."

ER 2-84

Taking privileges away from an 18-year-old adult is wrong, said Terry Ray, owner of three Aggieville taverns and two private clubs.

"It's an emotional issue right now, and I think Kansas needs to leave the law the way it is," he said.

President Reagan's Commission on Drunken Driving has urged Congress to set a nationwide legal drinking age of 21. States failing to comply would be threatened with a cut in their federal highway funds.

Only 19 states have established a legal drinking age of 21. Four states have a legal drinking age of 18.

The Legislature is dealing with the results and not the causation, said Jack Rogers, graduate student in family and child development.

Rogers, a bartender at the Sports Fan-atic, said he thinks the problem is not so much people getting drunk, but driving while intoxicated.

"The proposal of on-premises drinking is twisted immeasurably," Rogers said. "If passed, it would be an insane law."

Many students say they think raising the drinking age would be unjustified, citing a popular argument that if they are old enough to vote and be drafted, they are old enough to drink.

Bob O'Connor, sophomore in advertising and marketing, said he doesn't think raising the drinking age will make much difference in curbing alcohol consumption.

"I don't think we'll be any more mature about drinking at 18 than at 21," O'Connor said.

Governmental opponents to the proposals also exist. Gov. Richard Snelling of Vermont said he opposes raising the age. The solution to drunken driving among teenagers is improved education and better law enforcement of drunken driving laws, Snelling said.

Gunmen kill Sinai force director

By The Associated Press

ROME — Two gunmen on Wednesday shot and killed Leamon R. Hunt, the American director of a multinational force that patrols the Sinai. An anonymous caller said a group called the Fighting Communist Party was responsible for the attack.

Dr. Claudio Bevilacqua said by telephone from San Giovanni Hospital of Hunt: "He is dead. He has no heart beat. The bullet caused multiple fractures in the head. He has been clinically dead since 8:15 p.m. (2:15 EST)."

Dr. Evasio Fava, director of intensive care at the hospital, said Hunt died minutes after he was transferred to San Giovanni Hospital from Sant' Eugenio Hospital.

Maria Elena Caciotti, a spokeswoman at the Multinational Force and Observers headquarters here, confirmed earlier that Hunt, the force's civilian director-general, had been shot. "But we do not have any other details," she said.

The Italian news agency ANSA quoted police as saying he was shot in the head by three men who fled in a Fiat sedan. The U.S. Embassy confirmed the ANSA account.

In an anonymous telephone call to a Milan radio station, a man with a Roman accent said, "This is the Fighting Communist Party. We must claim the attempt on Gen. Hunt, the guarantor of the Camp David agreements. The imperialist forces must leave Lebanon. Italy must leave NATO. No to the installation of missiles in Comiso."

The attack came a few hours after Vice President George Bush left Rome. He had discussed the situation in Lebanon with Italian officials.

The multinational force monitors the Israeli-Egyptian accord that returned the Sinai to Egypt. Hunt, 57, a retired career diplomat, has been its director since the fall of 1982. He was a native of Mill Creek, Okla.

A separate multinational force, including American, Italian, French and British troops, is in the Beirut area of Lebanon. The anonymous caller apparently was also referring to this force, as well as to NATO plans to install nuclear missiles at Comiso, Italy, as part of the deployment of 572 new medium-range missiles in Western Europe.

Mall developers may add another store

Manhattan's proposed downtown mall may have another major store when it opens in 1987 or shortly thereafter.

Mayor Wanda Fateley, in a news conference Wednesday morning, said serious negotiations have begun between JCP Realty and Forest City Enterprises, partners in the mall project, and Dillard's, a major department store chain with headquarters in Little Rock, Ark.

Fateley said she received a phone call Tuesday from Forest City Vice President Mel Roebuck informing her of the negotiations. A written agreement may be prepared by as early as next week.

"I don't know when they'll be coming in or how that's going to affect the project," Fateley said. "We've just got a stronger project."

The city will adopt the position that it wants the Dillard's store in the mall when it opens, but only if that won't jeopardize the completion date or contracts, she said.

Community Development Director Gary Stith said it is possible that Dillard's could be in the mall when it opens, but "there are a lot of details to work out."

It hasn't been determined how the prospect of the new store will affect Urban Development Action Grant contracts scheduled for final approval Friday, Stith said. Housing and Urban Development Department officials will discuss the store with Stith when he travels to Washington, D.C., on Friday, he said.

"Forest City has always been talking to Dillard's," Stith said. "I think once you have a real center to talk about, it sells a lot easier."

Dillard's has a store in Wichita, and the chain has purchased the Kansas City area retailer Stix, Baer & Fuller and plans to place its name on the stores.

Gallery to display architect's work

A retrospective display of the work of architect E. Fay Jones is the next exhibit planned for the K-State Union Art Gallery. The exhibit will open at 3:30 p.m. Monday with a reception for Jones in the gallery. Robert Burnham, associate professor of architecture, is to speak on the significance of Jones' work. Following graduation from the University of Arkansas, Jones completed graduate studies at Rice Institute, was a Taliesin Fellow with Frank Lloyd Wright and taught at the University of Oklahoma before returning to the University of Arkansas as a faculty member. He became head of the architecture program at Arkansas in 1966. Jones' most celebrated building, Thorncrown Chapel in Eureka Springs, Ark., won an American Institute of Architects' honor award in 1981 and was cited by Time magazine as one of the five best buildings of the year.

Dance theater to perform Friday

The Pilobolus Dance Theater will perform at 8 p.m. Friday in McCain Auditorium. Since its formation in 1971, Pilobolus has created a dance style all its own. Pilobolus was started by four Dartmouth students and their modern dance instructor and named after an obscure fungus. A Newsweek magazine reviewer said, "As zany as the Marx Brothers, as clever as Houdini, this sextet of adept acrobats converts bodies into interlocking and interchangeable parts, erecting structures on stage that are closer to sculpture than dance." Tickets are available daily during business hours at the McCain Box Office.

Modern business topic of book

If chief executive officers of American corporations would make an honest effort to communicate openly to workers and consumers, this could add another 25 percent to the nation's Gross National Product and "spawn a new generation of inventiveness never before seen in the history of modern business." That is the theme of a new book "Image at the Top," recently published by The Free Press, Macmillan. Co-authors are Richard Ruch and Ronald Goodman. Both were associated with K-State when the book was completed this past year — Ruch as assistant dean of the College of Business Administration and Goodman as R.M. Seaton Visiting Professional in the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications. Ruch now is dean of the School of Business Administration at Rider College, and Goodman is president of a Des Moines, Iowa, management consulting firm. The book is based on five years of intensive research directed by Ruch for General Motors Corp. and AT&T. There also are case histories of such firms as Johnson and Johnson, Deere and Company, Procter & Gamble Co. and Xerox.

Visiting British architect to lecture

Neil Jackson, a British architect who is teaching in the Department of Architecture, will be speaking for the College of Architecture and Design and Fine Arts Council 1984 Faculty Lecture Series on Tuesday. Jackson will lecture on "Romanticism, Queen Victoria and the Scottish Baronial Revival," at 3:30 p.m. in the Union Little Theater. The public is welcome. Jackson, who is on leave from the Polytechnic of the South Bank in London, is teaching fifth year architectural design and courses in architectural history. The British architect has lectured in this country and in England and has published many articles in British architectural journals. He is now working on a book, "19th Century Bath," to be published by Avebury Publishing Co.

Folklife festival needs volunteers

Volunteers are needed for the sixth annual Kansas Folklife Festival to be held in Manhattan's Cico Park May 5 and 6. The festival is sponsored by the Division of Continuing Education. Jan Hurley, temporary instructor and conference coordinator for continuing education, is serving as the volunteer coordinator for the festival. Hurley said volunteers are needed to host folk artists and musicians and to help with ticket sales and the country store during the festival. Volunteers also are needed for miscellaneous jobs such as decorating the festival site, helping with the auction and working on set-up and clean-up crews. The festival emphasizes tradition and the passing of skills from one generation to another. Traditional artisans and musicians are screened by the state folklorist before being invited to perform at the festival. This is the third year the festival will have been held in Manhattan. It was held in Topeka for four years before the site was changed to Manhattan.

Committee tables bank bill; advocates plan new strategy

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The chief lobbyist for the group pushing legalization of multibank holding companies in Kansas said Wednesday he was "not discouraged at all" that the Senate Commercial and Financial Institutions Committee had tabled his bill. "I started late and in a very difficult committee," said Patrick Hurley, former secretary of the Department of Administration. "To come within one vote on consecutive days of getting it out of committee certainly encourages our efforts." The Senate panel voted 6-5 Wednesday to table a bill Hurley drafted with the blessing of Senate President Ross Doyen. A motion to report the bill to the Senate for debate and a vote, but without recommendation whether it should be passed, failed on a 5-5 tie vote in the same committee Tuesday. Both Hurley and his counterpart who is fighting multibanking, former Speaker Pete McGill, said the battle over multibanking was far from ended this year. The bill, which Hurley says includes safeguards to protect smaller banks from being gobbled up by big banks and also protects credit needs of consumers in rural Kansas, remains in the committee. Hurley, lobbyist for the Kansas Association for Economic Growth, declined in an interview to reveal proponents' strategy, but said several options are obvious. "I will continue to approach it exactly as I have up to now — very carefully," he said. "I think we have a bill that is a very attractive vehicle, and I've certainly heard a lot of legislators say they think it's easier to support than some earlier approaches." Hurley said possible options include: —Try to remove the bill from the Senate committee, either by successfully challenging the ruling of the chairman that it will take a two-thirds vote to take it off the table, or by having the full Senate vote to call it out of committee. —Run a new bill, either in the Senate or the House, and have Doyen refer it to a different committee to avoid Commercial and Financial Institutions. —Look for another bill and amend its provisions into it. McGill, lobbyist for the Kansas Independent Bankers Association, said there is little chance the bill tabled Wednesday will ever be resurrected, but agreed the issue won't be dead until the Legislature adjourns. "In all probability, that particular bill will not have much buoyancy," McGill said. "But I understand there are eight or nine vehicles running around here, and I'm sure the proponents will make every effort to revive it." The former speaker said he believes the effort will have to continue in the Senate because both House Speaker Mike Hayden and Chairman Harold Dyck of the House Commercial and Financial Institutions Committee have said they don't want to spend time on the multibank issue if it can't be passed in the Senate. Sen. Neil Arasmith, R-Phillipsburg, chairman of the Senate committee, ruled that it would take a two-thirds vote of the 11-member panel — or eight votes — to take the Doyen bill off the table for further consideration in the committee. Sen. Jerry Karr, a Democrat from Emporia who made the motion to table the bill, said he supported the concept of legalizing multibank holding companies as long as there are safeguards to protect smaller, local banks. Karr said he moved to table the measure in order to keep it from being killed. He said he thought more study should be given the bill before the Senate is called upon to vote it up or down. "I didn't want the complete concept killed," Karr said in explaining his motion to table the bill. "A week ago, a totally new concept was presented, and only the Senate president knew what was in it. Nobody else has had time to study it that much." "I think this is a concept we need to keep alive." The bill would remove the prohibition in Kansas law against corporations owning more than one bank, but would require approval by the state bank commissioner before they could buy other banks. The commissioner would base his approval on financial stability of the purchasing bank and impact on the community in which the purchased bank was located, among other factors.

Senators to review appointees

Approval of the appointment of the new student body president and student senators will be the main item of business at the Student Senate meeting at 7 p.m. today in the Union Big Eight Room. Senate Chairman Lori Leu said the procedure is a formality Senate must perform so the new officers may officially take office. Second reading of a bill that will allocate $75 to send letters to incoming freshmen scholarship recipients also is scheduled to be heard. The money will be used to cover the cost incurred by Student Governing Association in mailing the letters. The letters will be sent to Putnam, KSU Foundation and University scholarship recipients to inform them of the activities they can become involved in at K-State, Leu said. "They have received communication all along from the University," she said. "This is just a way to keep in touch with them." Senate also will hear second reading of a bill which would change the frequency that Student Publications, the Union and Recreational Services have their budgets extensively reviewed. Currently these groups are extensively reviewed every three years, but under the new bill they would only be reviewed every five years. Leu said the change is being made because their budgets are large and the review process is rather complicated. An annual budget will continue to be submitted under the proposal, Leu said. The bill also allows Senate to call for a full review of the programs if it deems it necessary.

Greeks raise funds to restore fountain

By TONA TURNER
Collegian Reporter

If city residents are generous, the fountain in Manhattan's City Park may receive a facelift.

The cast iron fountain has been chosen as the service project for this year's Greek Week, which continues through Friday.

Order of Omega, the greek honorary, organized a fund-raising campaign Sunday afternoon involving members from most of the University greek houses, said Theresa Korst, junior in journalism and mass communications and member of Order of Omega.

The participants were divided into four groups, and each group was assigned one-fourth of the city area to do door-to-door campaigning to raise money for the fountain.

The three-hour campaign raised $551.92, she said.

"We were really pleased with it, considering the circumstances," Korst said. "We didn't know what to expect since we've never tried something like this before."

Fund-raising will continue. The Order of Omega is planning to solicit businesses for further contributions, Korst said.

Bernd Foerster, dean of the College of Architecture and Design, directed the Greek Week campaign and has directed fund-raisers for the renovation of the fountain for several years.

Foerster said the estimated cost for complete renovation of the fountain is about $15,000. Through past fund-raising projects, the city has raised about $3,000.

City Park was planned in 1856 by Abram Berry and included forty-five acres, Foerster said. The first park commission was created when further plans were made for the land in 1889.

Mrs. R.B. Spilman, a member of the first park commission, immediately began a fund to build a fountain, and Manhattan women organized activities to raise money for it, he said. The first fund-raising social, directed by Spilman and Mrs.

A.J. Whitford, collected $35.

Eventually, a fountain basin was installed with hopes that a fountain could be added when money was available, he said.

Fund-raising projects continued, and in May 1895, the park commission dedicated a nearly twenty-foot cast iron fountain. Foerster said the fountain was made by the J.W. Fiske Company, one of the largest foundries in New York. The fountain cost $500.

According to a story in the Manhattan "Nationalist" May 10, 1895, $200 was given to the park commission from campaign funds, $250 was raised by subscription and benefits and the city chipped in $50.

The fountain has changed through the years, Foerster said. A ground-level basin or pool was originally built with an edge low to the ground. A higher stone edge was later added to the pool.

Sometime after 1976, large gargoyles (water spouts) on the stem between the lower, second and third tiers were removed. Many small gargoyles decorating the lowest and largest tier have also been lost through rust, time and vandals, he said.

The fountain is an example of Victorian cast iron architecture. Nineteenth century cast iron fountains are recognized to be valuable reminders of the past and many cities have restored their fountains to their former grandeur.

When funds are raised, Foerster said the fountain will immediately be disassembled and shipped out of state to be fixed. The fountain weighs too much to be shipped in one piece.

A company will strip the fountain down to bare metal for inspection. The company will then reassemble the casting, welding and bolting into three major parts to ship back to Manhattan, Foerster said. Manhattan welders would then assemble the three pieces into one.

Foerster said the entire renovation process would probably take six months to complete after the funds are raised.

County police seek rapist

At about 7 a.m. Feb. 7, a woman was raped in the north-west part of Manhattan.

The rape occurred when the victim got into her vehicle, which was parked in her driveway, and prepared to go to work. The suspect was hiding in the back seat of the car.

Following the rape, the suspect removed the victim's car keys and wallet prior to fleeing the vehicle. The victim described the man as possibly a small white male wearing a ski mask and nylon-type jacket.

Anyone having information on this or any other crime may call Crime Stoppers at 539-7777.

Callers will remain anonymous and may qualify for cash rewards of up to $1,000.

Several groups opposed both proposals, including the Kansas Beer Retailers Association, the Food Dealers' Association, the Kansas Wine and Spirits Association, the Kansas Retail Liquor Dealers' Association and the Kansas Association of Private Clubs. They said the bills would cause higher insurance for grocers, bars and taverns, liquor stores and private clubs.

The committee took no action Wednesday. Committee Chairman Rep. Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington, said a variety of alcohol-related bills will not be taken up until Tuesday.

Testimony was heard Monday on a bill which would prohibit all but on-premises consumption of 3.2 beer by people under 21.

ASK has taken a stand opposing the bill. Lambert said the bill will not achieve its objective of reducing alcohol-related accidents.

Honor society celebrates week of recognition

By LYNN MEIER
Collegian Reporter

Mortar Board National Honor Society, one of two senior honoraries on campus, is celebrating National Mortar Board Week this week.

K-State President Duane Acker proclaimed Feb. 12-17 the honorary's week of recognition, acknowledging the national designation for the group's recognition.

Mortar Board membership is based on scholarship, leadership and community service, said Jean Palma, senior in business management and president of the honorary.

Juniors with a 3.3 grade point average are considered for membership, Palma said. Applicants are interviewed and between five and 35 new members are selected each spring. There are currently 13 members in the K-State chapter, some who are studying abroad or doing internships in other areas of the country.

There are 187 active Mortar Board chapters on college campuses and 48 alumni clubs across the nation, Palma said. Currently, there are 114,000 collegiate and alumni Mortar Board members nationally. Students meet once every three years at a national Triennial Conference to create new bylaws and discuss business.

Mortar Board was founded on Feb. 16, 1918, at Ohio State University-Columbus; Swarthmore College-Swarthmore, Pa.; the University of Michigan-Ann Arbor and Cornell University-Ithaca, N.Y. The K-State chapter was chartered in 1928, ten years after the founding, Palma said.

"Every chapter independently decides on activities. The members determine the success of the chapter," Palma said.

"We try to foster scholarship, leadership and service through campus and community activities. We represent K-State through our services," she said.

Each fall, Mortar Board sponsors "A K-State Christmas," a musical variety show with a holiday theme. In the spring, during All-University Open House, the K-State High School Leadership Conference is coordinated by the honorary. Area high school students participate in workshops and listen to speakers, Palma said.

Initially, membership in Mortar Board was restricted to women. In 1976, male delegates were sent to the Triennial Conference for the first time. Since then, Mortar Board has been a coed honorary, Palma said.

"From the beginning, Mortar Board has been dedicated to the advancement of the status of women," Palma said.

She said her responsibility as president of the honorary is to act as a motivator and help each member to fulfill responsibilities.

"It is a unique experience to lead a group of leaders. Everyone takes their turn as a committee leader. Because the members have had prior leadership experiences, I never worry about things getting done," Palma said.

In conjunction with National Mortar Board Week, two scholarships of $200 are awarded by the honorary, she said. This year's recipients were Susan Stone, junior in modern languages, and Greg Culotta, junior in pre-law.

Campus needs more study areas

K-State and Manhattan don't provide enough space for students interested in late-night studying outside their homes. Farrell Library has taken the brunt of students' complaints on the study hall issue. Farrell, however, shouldn't be used as a study hall, but as a library.

Students living in residence halls often find it difficult to study in their rooms due to extraneous noise. Students living in apartments and greek houses may also have a similar problem.

The fact of the matter is, students, for whatever their reason for studying outside of the home environment, have very few places to go after 10:30 p.m.

Two rooms in Derby Food Complex are available for residence hall students to study in until 11 p.m. This facility accommodates 45 to 50 students for study purposes. Some residence halls also provide separate study rooms for residents.

For students living off campus, there is only one place on campus open until midnight for studying. The Catskeller on the ground floor of the Union is open until midnight throughout the week provided there is no scheduled entertainment. The concessions area outside the Catskeller is also available to students.

The only campus buildings open all night are Seaton Hall and Seaton Court. They are left open upon request of College of Architecture and Design administrators, said Evelyn Hupe, assistant to the vice president for University Facilities.

It would seem logical to open large lecture rooms on campus for the purpose of all-night studying. A department head, however, would have to take responsibility for the room, Hupe said. The facility could have one door open to the outside and the rest of the building closed off to students. A proctor or security guard could be posted for safety purposes.

Rooms that could be considered for late-night study use are Kedzie 106, considering its outside access, and Weber 107, which would be especially convenient for Derby complex residents.

K-State students need a late-night study hall on campus. Responsible action should be taken by University administration to provide lecture rooms in campus buildings to meet students' study needs.

National election lost in chaos

Judging from newspaper headlines and the evening news, recent current events have a definite negative tone. Fighting breaks out in Beirut; little hope exists for a summit meeting with new Soviet premier Konstantin Chernenko; the grain fumigant EDB is banned by the Environmental Protection Agency; the federal budget deficit looms menacingly over the economy; nuclear buildup continues unceasingly; El Salvador could become another Vietnam and a presidential election approaches.

Small wonder that the election in November is being ignored. Not only are the Democratic presidential candidates old news, but recent international developments have usurped the media stage.

An almost ominous tone has settled on world events with conflicts both in the Middle East and Central America and uneasiness over Soviet-American relations. Complicating the situation is this impending presidential election with its own discord. But because of the international political power plays now in the forefront, the candidates, except President Reagan, have lost media attention.

Too much extraneous attention may have already been paid to the presidential race, but it is important to realize that in such a time of heightened tension and conflict, the upcoming election is important. How President Reagan handles conflicts such as those in the Middle East and Central America may determine if he is re-elected. Four years ago the Iranian hostage crisis preceded the defeat of Jimmy Carter for re-election.

In light of other news, the election's media appeal may fade. But its outcome may prove to be the climax of a long string of skirmishes, conflicts, and negotiations both at home and abroad. For this it should not be ignored nor its value underestimated.

Jailing jocks not the answer

Most people would agree that there is a drug problem in this country, and that something should be done about it. It is said that this problem is most evident in the arena of professional sports. Therefore, one effective way of curtailing the problem should be to control it in those visible circles.

Late last year four Kansas City Royals players were prosecuted and convicted for either the intent to purchase or the possession of cocaine. They were aware of the law and broke the law, therefore they should be punished, right? They were all given three-month sentences. On the surface this is correct — these people, simply because they are folk heroes, should not receive preferential treatment.

Prosecuting these athletes has made drug control more visible. At the same time it has exposed the fact that our laws in this case are not logical?

As far as I know, every society has a set of drugs. In our society there is a continuum of "mind-altering drugs," starting at one end with chocolate, then moving up through caffeine, alcohol, cocaine, marijuana, to perhaps heroine at the other extreme. Society, and each individual, must draw a line between acceptable and unacceptable drugs.

DAN ROBISON
Collegian Columnist

Currently, consumption of cocaine is unlawful, whereas consumption of another drug, alcohol, is lawful. I feel that this line is arbitrary. Why not draw it between caffeine and alcohol? Isn't alcohol closer to cocaine in its effects than it is to caffeine?

This is not a case where one substance on the line is simply approved and the next discouraged. It is case where one is encouraged and the next considered a crime.

Take Royals' center fielder Willie Wilson, caught with the intention of purchasing a small amount of cocaine. As a hero, he is a role-model for young, impressionable people. Young people must not be led to think that it is all right to consume this drug. When Wilson breaks the law "he must be made an example." What is his punishment? A three month jail sentence.

Take another professional athlete, Bert Jones, of Miller beer commercial fame. He is also a role-model for young people. The beer company is very aware of this — in fact, it is why they pay him to endorse their product.

As a famous athlete, Jones is viewed daily by millions of youngsters. He has the intent not just of possessing, but of selling a mind-altering drug — alcohol. How does society punish him? He makes hundreds of thousands of dollars, becomes yet more famous and is allowed to continue playing his sport.

Whereas Wilson is suspended from playing pro ball for a year, Jones now has a profitable, dual career.

Much of the problem is that people do not consider alcohol to be a mind-altering drug. These are probably the same people overheard to comment, "I am going to get so drunk this weekend!" Is this not a conscious effort to alter one's mind?

We can jail famous jocks 'till the cows come home. But the drug problem in this country cannot be approached until people recognize that the principal problem drug is alcohol.

Financial aid policies give athletes priority

Editor,
Today I received a flyer titled "Policy on Satisfactory Academic Progress for the Office of Student Financial Assistance." In part, this publication states: "All recipients of student financial assistance will be required to meet at least the standards for satisfactory academic progress. The only program not covered by this policy is athletic grants-in-aid."

I find it unconscionable for a major university participating in a nationally recognized intercollegiate athletic conference to set a double standard for non-athletic vs. athletic students, particularly since the same publication contains a "Notice of Non-Discrimination" which proclaims non-discrimination on the basis of "non-merit" reasons such as race, sex and handicap. Hence must we infer that there is "non-merit" to being a racial minority or female but "merit" to being an athlete?

I also find it incredible that the faculty (the policy was adopted by the Faculty Senate Nov. 9, 1982) and administration of this University are willing to publish the existence of a double standard for athletes, given the national uproar about athletes who only play ball and never receive a degree. Apparently we attend a university that allows financial aid discrimination only on the basis of athletic ability.

Game of strategy requires thought, action

Editor,
We at Driver Brothers Intl. are attempting to compete in the adult game business by marketing a new game called "Significant Pursuits." In it, the players each select a question and try to honestly and rationally answer it. Then they must determine how the facts involved in the answering of this question will affect their lives.

Nobody "wins" the game after only an hour or two of play. It takes quite a bit of diligence and a willingness to act on the basis of one's thoughts for success to be achieved. Here are a few questions from the game.

— In recent history, which has been a more successful tactic for the United States in solving international disputes, the use of peaceful negotiations or the use of the military?

— What is the difference between a brutal communist regime and a brutal rightist regime? In other words, which one does less for human dignity and freedom?

— Why is a strong military inherently better than a strong program of social reform? Can this be equated metaphorically to erecting an elaborate defense system complete with first strike capability around a deteriorating legacy?

— Is not approximately $900 billion in budget outlays combined with a $200 billion deficit more Keynesian than supply side economics? From a slightly different angle, are the sizes of the numbers of secondary importance to where they fall (on the rich or poor) in determining the classification of the economic strategy?

— Since we passed the level of Mutual Assured Destruction several years ago, why is it now necessary to be "ahead" of the Soviets? In the same vein, how does one define "a position of strength?" Is "strength" the ability to destroy (ideally) the world 100 times over while weakness allows only 50?

— How do we reconcile our decision to deploy missiles in Europe with our refusal to allow the Soviets to do so in Cuba?

— Why is it acceptable for us to ensure the existence of "compatible" governments in our hemisphere through means of force (e.g. Grenada) but not for the Soviets to do so in their hemisphere (e.g. Afghanistan)?

— Why did the public approve of the decision not to let the press cover the early stages of the invasion of Grenada? Does knowing the truth lessen national credibility?

This is a game which can be played at virtually any time and in virtually any place. It requires only a minimum of two players who are concerned about their country and who are equipped with a certain level of knowledge. It will be on the market as soon as the public wants it to be; hopefully, sometime before November.

President's words still apply

Editor,
I stumbled onto the words of one of our great Americans the other day. Although spoken some 20-odd years ago, the passage is seemingly more relevant today than it was then. The words are an admonition, as of yet unheeded:

"...There is no way in which a country can satisfy the craving for absolute security — but it easily can bankrupt itself morally and economically in attempting to reach that illusory goal through arms alone. The Military Establishment, not productive of itself, necessarily must feed on the energy, productivity and brainpower of the country, and if it takes too much, our total strength declines."

This is an excerpt from the farewell address given by Dwight D. Eisenhower. A soldier and statesman of remarkable insight (an increasingly rare combination), he knew what apparently our leadership of today does not: that after a certain point is reached, more military might is actually detrimental to the nation it supposedly serves.

Our political elite is operating on the assumption that if more arms equal more security, then there is no limit to the amount of security a nation can have. This spurious reasoning overlooks the point of diminishing returns so clearly pointed out by Eisenhower. It is actually possible to make one's nation more vulnerable by enormous spending.

Greek adviser merits praise

Editor,
Re: "Panhellenic advisers seek records audit," in the Feb. 14 Collegian.

I'm very proud to be a part of the greek system at K-State. It's one of the best in the nation and has been awarded as such in various ways throughout the last decade. It is during this last decade that Barb Robel has been the adviser for Greek Affairs, and I don't believe the correlation is merely coincidental. She's a very talented and capable woman who combines this with a lot of dedication and hard work to ensure effective greek system operations.

Of course, these operations are done by many able individuals along the way as well. But over the years the faces have come and gone. Thanks to Barb, though, the stability and excellence have remained through the continuity of her advisership.

Her outstanding service has gone largely unrewarded, because as busy students we don't often take the time to credit the source of the excellence which we take for granted. We are extremely thankful for her guidance and given the opportunity, I believe almost every greek would sign this letter in support of Barb Robel.

Being proud of this greek system is being proud of Barb Robel. And we are.

High technology. These words alone command attention and often respect. Though it is impossible to give such a general concept an encompassing definition, it's rarely unidentifiable. Computers, the backbone of high technology, are applicable in almost all aspects of life, from research to grocery checkout lanes.

"Trying to define high technology can take a page and a half," Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering said, adding that agreement on a definition wouldn't be acceptable to everyone. Rathbone is one of several faculty at K-State trying to meet the increasing demand for competent developers and service personnel of high technology.

According to Virgil Wallentine, head of the Department of Computer Science, there were 150 computer science majors in 1979 as compared to the 600 currently enrolled in that field.

"We're starting to peak out now. Whether or not the growth rate will continue is unknown," he said.

Last year, 76 undergraduate and 23 graduate degrees were awarded to computer science majors at K-State. An additional 23 undergraduate degrees were awarded to majors in information systems, the other major offered in the department.

Bell Laboratory claims it has the capacity for hiring as many computer programmers as K-State could produce from now until the year 2000 to meet its needs.

The U.S. Department of Defense is 100,000 computer programmers short, and defense officials speculate the department will be 1 million programmers short by 1990, Wallentine said.

However, "others say as software develops, there won't be a need for as many programmers," he said.

Computer hardware, the actual circuit boards of the equipment, can be created by other computers. In the next 25 years, computers also will be able to develop their own software, providing they are programmed with certain limitations, he said.

"That will not get rid of the need for computer scientists, but will slow the growth rate. That still won't get rid of the need for bigger and better and more powerful systems," he said. "Right now the growth in need (for programmers) exceeds the supply."

The demand for computer scientists is reflected in starting wages. After graduation, a student landing a job with the auto industry can expect an annual salary of $25,000, according to a national self-report income survey. This is comparable to starting wages of engineers.

Another currently popular area of high technology is engineering, specifically electrical engineering.

"I would say the market for electrical engineers is especially good at this time. Most high technology is involving electrical engineering," Bruce Laughlin, director of the Career Planning and Placement Center, said. Laughlin is in charge of placing engineers in jobs. The reason for the demand is because of "heavy emphasis on computerization," he said.

In 1979, 53 students graduated from K-State in electrical engineering and 324 graduated in engineering, while in 1983, 121 undergraduates and graduates in electrical engineering received their degrees, according to the "1984 Employers' Guide to Graduates," which is distributed by the center. A total of 549 students from K-State graduated with engineering degrees last year, the pamphlet stated.

Other colleges and departments on campus also are getting into the high technology act, again mostly with computers, but from the user rather than the developer standpoint. The College of Education is one of several areas of the University where microcomputer learning is taking place.

"We are providing undergraduate and graduate instruction in microcomputer techniques," Jordan Utsey, dean of the college, said. He said the move to educate future educators in microcomputer use is in response to the increase in public schools' usage of microcomputers in the classroom.

"We have to gear up for all of them (computers) since schools are using different computers. People like to learn on the ones they will be using, so we have a few of each," he said. Microcomputer instruction is part of the educational media course required of education majors. The center currently has 30 microcomputers, Utsey said.

The academic world has been aware for "a long time" that it is possible to teach people using computers. The question they ask themselves is, "What is the best way to do it?" Utsey said. Positive immediate feedback research is being conducted by graduate students within the college.

The University as a whole, while meeting short-term needs, is also looking to the future. A high technology center is being developed by several University faculty and the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

"Basically, what we are working on right now is agri-tech. That has been the main thrust recently," Tom Whalen, director of operations for the chamber, said. Agri-tech, the name given to high technology in agricultural equipment, is only one industry in several that will be included in the high technology center, he said.

"We have worked with most all of the faculty on campus who do outside consulting," he said. Faculty members may be aware of a business looking to expand and that business could be acceptable to Manhattan, he said.

The first stage in developing a high technology center, including agri-tech and other firms, is to entice research and development firms into the community. Major companies such as IBM and John Deere expand into environments already set up for research and development, he said.

"People should understand that this has been going on for years," Rathbone said. K-State, the Kansas Department of Economic Development and the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce have been working on the development of a high technology center in the area for six to eight years, he said.

Parker-Hannifin Corporation, a rubber hose facility, and TRW Motors Inc., makers of small motors, are two firms brought to Manhattan as a result of the joint effort, Whalen said. The University and the chamber are interested in "clean industry" such as computer and robotic companies, to locate in Manhattan, Rathbone said.

The financial backing for the high technology center is now flowing for the first time up the river from Topeka. The state has set aside $1 million this year for research and development at K-State, the University of Kansas and Wichita State University. K-State will receive one-third of that sum, or $300,000, Rathbone said.

"You can't expect a high technology industry to develop overnight with that modest amount of money," Wallentine said. He said that it takes millions of dollars a year for several years to develop a high technology center.

Principal calls for University's cooperation

A local elementary school principal called for better cooperation between the University and the Manhattan public school system at a program Tuesday sponsored by the Riley County Historical Society.

Robert Anderson, principal of Marlatt Elementary School, made the statement during the second discussion of "School Daze: From The Three Rs To A Nation At Risk." The discussion was conducted at the Riley County Historical Society Museum.

James Benjamin, superintendent of Manhattan Unified School District No. 383, and R. Kent Donovan, assistant professor of history, also spoke.

Anderson said an example of cooperation is a proposed science program in which University professors would present demonstrations and lectures in public schools.

"If we sit down and talk, we could really enhance it (the relationship)," Anderson said.

Benjamin cited a government report on education in the United States that suggests public schools should raise both the math and science credits required for graduation by three.

"I don't particularly agree with that suggestion, although I do agree that the quality of our schools could be better," Benjamin said.

Ex-Panther adjusts to the 1980s

NORTHFIELD, Minn. — Ex-Black Panther Bobby Seale, a 1960s symbol of black power, now has to cope with the trends of the 1980s. Just when Seale, 47, thought he was finished writing his cookbook, "Barbecuing with Bobby," editors asked for revisions including more no-salt, low-sugar recipes.

Meanwhile, Seale hasn't lost interest in his old causes. Speaking at St. Olaf College here Tuesday as part of its Black History Month observance, Seale told students about the history of the Black Panther Party and community-based economics.

Seale also said he supports the Rev. Jesse Jackson's bid for the Democratic presidential nomination, with former Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota as a second choice. He has volunteered to help Jackson, but hasn't received a reply.

"My name is a tough piece of history for them," said Seale, famous for the stormy trial — at which he was bound and gagged to keep order in the late Judge Julius Hoffman's courtroom — that stemmed from the disturbances at the 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago.

Seale said his 17-year-old son plans to join the Army when he completes high school this spring.

"I think it's fine," said Seale, who was thrown out of the Air Force before his tour of duty was up. "Whether he is in Army or in a job, he still has a social structure to deal with. Is it different to run into racism in Army or here on the streets?"

Pope's next visit a Dutch treat

THE HAGUE, Netherlands — Pope John Paul II will meet with Dutch government leaders here during a week-long tour of Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands next year, says a spokesman for the Dutch church.

The Netherlands leg of the trip, expected to last three days, also will include visits to the centers of Dutch Catholicism in Limburg and Utrecht, said spokesman Cees Middelhof. About 30 percent of the Dutch are Roman Catholic.

The tour is scheduled for the week of May 12, 1985, to coincide with Ascension Day celebrations, he said.

The visit would be John Paul's first to the Benelux countries since his election. However, in the years after World War II, he studied at the University of Louvain in Belgium and spent time in the southern Netherlands.

'Production line' running smoothly

COVENTRY, England — Prince Charles blushed Wednesday when workers at the Jaguar automobile factory here pulled his leg about the "royal production line" following the announcement that he's going to be a father again.

Charles, 35, was chatting with machinist Terry McCauley, 37, as he toured the plant with Princess Diana and told him: "You're doing good work. Production's going well."

McCauley replied: "Your production line is going well, too."

Charles went pink and laughed as he walked away, advising, "Keep up the good work."

"You too, mate," McCauley bellowed after the retreating heir to the throne.

Center director resigns, may face drug charge

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Shawnee County prosecutor said Wednesday he will decide this morning whether to bring a drug charge against the former director of the state's new inmate prerelease center at Topeka.

G.E. "Zach" Sahker, 37, resigned Tuesday after a substance believed to be marijuana was discovered in his car, state officials said Wednesday.

Sahker was selected just three weeks ago by state Corrections Secretary Michael Barclay to be administrator of the prerelease center, which is scheduled for opening this summer in remodeled facilities at Topeka State Hospital.

David Barclay, special assistant to Barclay, confirmed Sahker had quit his position at the center. He also confirmed the discovery of the substance thought to be marijuana.

Richard Mills, a deputy corrections secretary, also confirmed the substance was found and that Sahker had resigned.

Sahker declined comment.

Barclay, who was in Wichita Wednesday to discuss community corrections programs with the Sedgwick County Board of Commissioners, called the incident unfortunate, but said he had no choice but to demand Sahker's resignation.

"When a person wants to smoke some pot in the privacy of his own home is one thing," Barclay told an interviewer. "We don't condone it, but that's none of our concern. But when it's on state property and it's brought on the property, then we'd have to deal with that."

"He should have known that taking a car on prison property is subject to search for contraband. They found what they believed to be marijuana in his car."

"We could not tolerate that kind of situation, and we asked for his resignation and we received it quickly."

No determination had been made whether charges would be brought against Sahker, but District Attorney Gene Olander said he would decide today.

A report on an internal investigation by a special agent of the Department of Corrections was delivered to Olander Wednesday afternoon. The prosecutor said he had not yet reviewed it, but would by today when he will decide what action to take.

The substance was found in Sahker's car, Barclay said, during a routine search after Sahker took it to the Kansas Vocational Training Center in east Topeka to have repair work done on it by inmates studying auto mechanics.

"The secretary is disappointed that this occurred," Barclay said. "We had no indication of any problems. I think he would make the comment that we will closely scrutinize the new applicants."

"We hope to name a successor soon, so we can still bring the program on line by June 15."

Sahker was hired for the post of administrator of the new Topeka Prerelease Center on Jan. 25, at a salary of $23,676.

The center will house inmates who are within three months of being released from prison and is designed to gradually reacquire them with outside society.

Barclay hailed his availability at the time, saying Sahker "has a solid track record of running and working in community treatment facilities."

Sahker helped write and implement the American Correctional Association's standards for halfway houses and was program director of the first ACA-accredited halfway house in the nation in Cincinnati, Ohio. He also is a former director of an emergency shelter care facility in Hamilton, Ohio.

He taught criminal justice at Washburn University in 1978-81 and most recently was in private business in Topeka, operating his own energy conservation products company.

Sahker has been working on a doctorate degree in sociology at the University of Kansas. He holds a master's degree in corrections from Xavier University of Ohio.

The Corrections Department is opening a second inmate prerelease center at Winfield State Hospital and Training Center this summer.

Feminist film attacks pornography

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

"Not A Love Story: A Film About Pornography" is less a film documentary than a document of feminist beliefs. The film is used only as a method of presentation in allowing many Canadian feminists to voice their opinions.

Filmmaker Bonnie Sherr Klein developed the project, which was funded by the National Film Board of Canada. In "Not A Love Story" she enlists the aid of a Montreal stripper, Linda Lee Tracy. Tracy becomes Klein's pet reclamation project as they explore the world of pornography as seen in peep shows and strip joints.

Review

Klein makes very clear the extent to which pornography has become a major industry in North America. She uses images in the film which depict the types of pornography that can be purchased across the country. The images she uses are never used gratuitously or without justification.

Klein uses interviews with several Canadian feminists to express the belief that pornography is an expression of hatred toward women. Writer/artist Kate Millett says, "It's all mixed up with old, dreadful, patriarchal ideas that sex is essentially evil, and the evil in it is female." This point of view is presented quite convincingly in "Not A Love Story." When Klein tries for more, though, implying that pornography is a cause of sexual inequality, she runs into problems.

When a woman writer uses James Baldwin's classic statement on the plight of blacks to apply to women — "To be a woman of conscious anywhere on this planet is to be in a continual state of rage." — it's important to note that she doesn't say "to be a human..." While too much shouldn't be made of this point, it is clear that she chooses to exclude men from her generalization — as if men are a separate species against which women must protect themselves.

While it may be true that women are enslaved by the constant realization that they are potential victims, the filmmakers have turned this realization into a segregation of men and women into two completely different segments of society. These feminists then point a finger at the men for being perverted by exposure to pornography. They disregard the influence that society has had upon men and women, and how society has helped to create the paranoia that these women obviously feel.

These women cannot be faulted for having this fear, though, because in the society we live — a society where the sanctity of life and the dignity of the individual is constantly losing importance — there has been demand for the type of pornography depicted in this film. If you believe, like Klein, that pornography directly causes the ills present in society, then "Not A Love Story" is sure to confirm your beliefs and will no doubt seem to be a very powerful film. If, on the other hand, you believe that pornography is only a symptom of the ills in society, then "Not A Love Story" will have a much less significant impact on you.

Klein never tries to understand why pornography has been in demand; she just believes that the presence of pornography has caused the ills, thus she doesn't have to understand why the present situation may have resulted. This allows her to avoid all the major questions and focus only upon how deplorable she finds the present trends in pornography. As a result, Klein eventually makes the type of generalizations that promote attitudes of hostility towards sex.

Klein condemns not just the violent pornography that she depicts in the film, but all pornography. All pornography seems to be the same to her: a means for expressing male domination over women. She only uses images which promote her thesis, excluding, for example, what the presence of homosexual pornography means within the context of her thesis.

Quite conveniently Klein neglects to mention anything about women being a large percentage of the X-rated video tape consumers. She assumes that the entire audience is male and that all the films are aimed at male audiences.

Principal-Counselor-Student Conference

The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of the high schools listed below to attend the 1984 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with their former students about the student's preparation for and experiences in KSU academic programs, the student's feelings as to how the high school curriculum could be improved, and the student's concerns about their adjustment from high school to university life.

Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school, while gaining valuable information about making your KSU experience a more meaningful one for you. It is also an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates.

Students attending are welcome to drop by the location below anytime between 10:15 a.m. and 12:15 p.m. on February 22. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

Hartman ties record

Led by 21 points from junior guard Tom Alfaro, K-State chalked up its third conference win of the Big Eight season, 74-64, over the University of Colorado Buffaloes Wednesday night. With the victory, K-State Coach Jack Hartman tied former 'Cats Coach Tex Winter in school career wins with 262.

Since Alfaro was switched from forward to the guard position, the 'Cats have shown new life. The team posted a 67-46 win over the University of Missouri and a narrow loss to the front-running University of Oklahoma Sooners, to go along with the win over Colorado. The 'Cats evened their overall record to 11-11, 3-6 in the conference with the victory, while Colorado fell to 13-9, 4-5 in the conference.

"For a while we weren't getting any perimeter shooting, but with Tom in there it gives us a different look," Hartman said. "He's a free shooter and that's good, because he's ready to shoot the ball."

In the opening half, the 'Cats jumped to a 4-0 lead on buckets by junior forward Eddie Elder and Alfaro. But capitalizing on early K-State turnovers, the Buffs raced to an 8-4 lead, helped by two steals for easy buckets by guard Mike Reid.

The Buffs then went cold, failing to score a field goal for more than eight minutes. K-State led by 12 points before Buff center Randy Downs hit from eight feet with 7:33 remaining to make the score 23-13.

The 'Cats went into the locker room at halftime holding a 32-23 advantage.

The start of the final half looked like a repeat of K-State's showing in its 74-66 loss to the Buffs earlier in the season. In that contest, the 'Cats held a halftime lead, only to be blown away by a 17-2 Colorado outburst in the final 20 minutes. Led by Reid's three baskets, Colorado roared back to trim the 'Cats lead to 37-34.

This time K-State controlled the final 10 minutes. Led by three baskets from Elder, the 'Cats pushed the lead back to 10, 54-44, with 8:30 remaining.

"I thought that was the pivotal part of the game," Colorado Head Coach Tom Apke said. "We played much better coming out in the second half. We cut it to four. But the time down the floor when K-State got three shots really hurt our momentum. Although we stopped them, we spent so much time on defense it hurt us."

"We played hard, but good K-State defense and our own cold shooting hurt our chances," Apke said.

The rest of the game was a free-throw shooting derby for the 'Cats. K-State shot 29 charities in the second half, connecting on 20, to maintain its lead. Down the stretch, Colorado could come no closer than nine as the 'Cats coasted to a relatively easy win.

Eddie Elder grabs a rebound over the University of Colorado's Vince Kelley during the first half of K-State's 74-64 victory Wednesday night in Ahearn Field House. The 'Cats moved their record to 11-11 overall with the victory.

Trailing Alfaro, two 'Cats scored in double figures. Elder hit for 18 points, 14 in the second half, while sophomore guard Jim Roder chipped in 12. Reid led the Buffs with 18 points.

For Alfaro, the switch of positions has given new life to his offensive game.

"I think switching me to guard has given me more good shots," he said. "I'm bigger than most guards, and guard is where I wanted to play — I played guard in junior college."

For Hartman, tying with Winter marked another milestone in an already-successful coaching career.

"Tex had great seasons at Kansas State, and it's an honor to be considered with him," he said.

The 'Cats will look to notch their second straight home court victory Saturday afternoon, taking on the Oklahoma State University Cowboys.

Road teams grab victories in Big Eight

Carl Henry's basket with 18 seconds remaining lifted Kansas past Nebraska 67-66 in a Big Eight Conference basketball game at Lincoln.

The basket by Henry, who had 20 points in the Wednesday night game, culminated a comeback by Kansas that began after the Jayhawks trailed 66-61 with 1:42 to go.

Calvin Thompson closed the gap to 66-63 with a basket with about 1:30 to go. Then Henry intercepted a Dave Hoppen pass, drove the length of the court for a layup to make the score 66-65 with 59 seconds to go.

Nebraska had another pass, this one by Stan Cloudy, intercepted by Kelly Knight which set up Henry's winning basket.

The Huskers had one last chance but a 20-foot shot by David Ponce glanced off the rim with 5 seconds to go. Kansas was able to grasp the rebound to preserve the win.

Hoppen scored a career high of 28 points for Nebraska, including 19 in the second half. Cloudy had 14 points for the Huskers, now 4-5 in conference play and 14-8 overall.

Other Kansas players in double figures were Thompson with 14 points, and Ron Kellogg and Knight, with 12 points apiece.

Kansas is now 6-3 in the conference and 15-7 overall.

Freshman guard Tim McCalister canned a pair of free throws with 31 seconds left, giving ninth-ranked Oklahoma a breathtaking 57-55 victory over arch-rival Oklahoma State.

Sooner All-America Wayman Tisdale preserved the victory with eight seconds left when he blocked a jump shot by Oklahoma State's Joe Atkinson, helping Oklahoma improve to 21-3 overall and 8-1 in the league.

Tisdale led Oklahoma with 14 points, followed by Jan Pannell with 13 and Shawn Clark 12, all in the first half. Atkinson led Oklahoma State with 18, while Charles Williams had 14 and Ray Crenshaw 11.

Missouri held high-scoring forward Barry Stevens to just five points to post a 64-61 victory over Iowa State.

Stevens, who entered the game as the league's second leading scorer at 23.8 points per game, did not score a point until hitting a short follow-up shot with one minute, 50 seconds to play.

Missouri was led by Malcom Thomas with 13 points and Ted Mimmitt added 10.

Harris led Iowa State with 23 while Allen added 17. Reserve Ron Virgil had 10.

Sumners skates atop Games' rankings

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — Rosalynn Sumners led the women's figure skating competition Wednesday after winning the compulsorys, while U.S. teammates Elaine Zayak and Tiffany Chin had their medal hopes riddled with low scores at the XIV Olympic Winter Games.

That means it's virtually up to Sumners, 19, the world and U.S. champion from Edmonds, Wash., to face top contenders Elena Vodorezova of the Soviet Union and Katarina Witt of East Germany, who finished second and third, respectively.

Meanwhile, Judy Blumberg and Michael Seibert, who lost a bronze ice dancing medal by an eyelash, were still trying to figure out why.

The 23 women will skate their program today, just before the men — led by U.S. gold medal favorite Scott Hamilton — skate for medals.

Things couldn't have gone worse for Zayak, who finished 13th. The former U.S. and world champion vowed a comeback at the U.S. Championships last month, but got only third place behind Chin.

Her last chance for Olympic glory all but disappeared when she fared poorly in each of the three school figures — variations of the figure-eight — each woman is required to trace.

Zayak left the Skenderija rink through a side exit and passed up interviews.

Gelderman said Zayak botched the first figure (finishing 12th), but she couldn't understand why she finished 13th for the second figure.

Hamilton maintained his lead entering today's finale despite losing the short program Tuesday to Canada's Brian Orser.

Like Sumners, he won the compulsories and U.S. singles skaters haven't done that since 1956 when Hayes Alan Jenkins and Tenley Albright went on to sweep the gold for America.

Sumners traced one winning figure and placed second on two other figures which were won by Vodorezova. But Sumners finished first overall by collecting a better total of judges' placements in the section counting 30 percent toward the total score.

Witt, 18, who skated the last two figures with an upset stomach, placed third on all three figures.

The last U.S. woman to win gold was Dorothy Hamill at the 1976 Innsbruck Games. East Germany's Anett Poetzsch won the gold medal at the 1980 Lake Placid Games, while Linda Fratianne finished second.

In men's competition, Jean-Christophe Simond of France remained second overall behind Hamilton and West German Rudi Cerne was third. The order was unchanged from Monday's compulsory event.

Brian Boitano, 20, of Sunnyvale, Calif., skated strongly in the short program — which counts 20 percent of the total score — for a third-place finish and moved up to sixth overall.

The other U.S. entry, Mark Cockerell of Los Angeles, was 17th. Hamilton, 25, of Denver, would become the first U.S. Olympic medalist in the event since David Jenkins in 1960.

Blumberg and Seibert, who danced to "Scheherazade," lost the bronze on one 5.5 mark from Italian judge Cia Bordogna and finished fourth after the free dance.

The two, however, said they believe their routine is medal worthy and will perform it next month at the World Championships in Ottawa.

Men's tennis team to start spring play

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

Hampered by youth and inexperience, K-State's men's tennis squad opens its spring season with a triangular meet Thursday and Friday, facing West Texas State University and Texas Tech University at Lubbock. After losing four players off of last year's 9-13 dual meet record squad, K-State is going into the season with almost a new team.

Head Coach Steve Webb lost two players to graduation, while another player chose to sit out this season. The biggest loss for the team was the departure of last year's top player Jeff Jackard, who transferred to another program. Because of the losses, Webb will field a young squad, featuring three freshmen and two sophomores.

"We're really young and lack experience," Webb said. "This year we're just looking to gain some experience and build for the future."

Sophomore Kris James, the team's No. 4 player last season, will return as this year's No. 1 singles player.

"Kris has a chance to beat the top players from Colorado and Iowa State in the conference this year," Webb said. "The other four schools (the University of Missouri doesn't have a tennis team) have really No. 1 players, but he could pick up a couple of wins for us."

Webb said that as the top returning player, James will be counted on to fill a leadership role this season.

K-State's only other returning player, senior Mark Hassenflu, is recuperating from a broken foot, but should rejoin the team in two weeks, Webb said. Last season, Hassenflu was the team's No. 5 player.

Starting the season, Webb will have freshmen players in the second, third and fourth positions.

Richard Blevins and Scott Sandlin come to the K-State program out of Oklahoma high schools.

"They competed in the Oklahoma state tournament last year and were both ranked in Missouri Valley competition," Webb said. "They're both good players who were overlooked by other schools and came to K-State as walk-ons."

Webb said the third freshman, Zane Burke, also is a talented player from Hutchinson with state high school tournament experience and a Missouri Valley ranking.

"We have a lot of talent. We need a couple of players that can play No. 1 and 2 to come in," Webb said. "If I could go out and find a couple of other players to play above Kris, it would help our program."

Recruiting top area talent is tough, Webb said, because of the tennis teams' small budget. There also is the tendency for the top players to play for warm weather schools in the West and South.

"It's hard for me to justify giving one player a full scholarship because of our small budget," Webb said. "We usually split our scholarship money among our top four players. Giving one player a scholarship might hurt our team morale."

Facing Texas Tech and West Texas State in their first match is a tough way to start the season, Webb said.

"Both teams are very strong," he said. "Texas Tech comes from the Southwest conference, the strongest conference in the nation, along with the Pac 10. We played them last year and lost 9-0. West Texas State is also good. They're one of the top three teams in the Missouri Valley Conference. We're looking to get a few good wins, realistically."

Set it Pete

Lifetime records, seasonal records, dual records and records with asterisks.

The sports world thrives on records. Ever notice how networks televising sports — most notably baseball — seem to have some statistic or bit of trivia for the announcer to throw out at the audience for every player or situation?

"Sammy Shortstop is hitting .439 with runners of a Puerto Rican descent in scoring position and a left-handed pitcher with a wife and three kids on the mound."

The fact that many people remember these tidbits of facts and figures goes to show how much value the sporting public puts on records and statistics.

The Montreal Expos recently signed a 42-year-old first baseman, hoping he can provide the leadership that will enable the ball club to reach the playoffs. It also happens that this individual — the record-conscious Peter Edward Rose — happens to be 202 hits away from surpassing Ty Cobb's record for most hits in a career.

Sugar Ray Leonard has decided to return to the ring to continue his boxing career, despite the risk of possibly having his eyesight permanently damaged. Aside from his desire to swap punches in the ring again, there is the possibility of being the first fighter to have possessed boxing titles in four different weight divisions.

Neither one of these athletes needs the money. Both will go down in sport's history as two of the top people in their respective professions. So why continue?

The reason is simple — it's a chance to have their names inscribed on the pages of record books with their lofty accomplishments listed next to them. Something to leave behind them when they've eventually called it quits and have drifted out of the public limelight.

HUEY COUNTS
Sports Editor

I think that one of the motives behind Jim Brown criticizing Franco Harris — saying that he was hanging on to break his all-time rushing yardage record — was that along with the fact that his record was going to fall, it gave him another chance to move into the spotlight. He got his picture on the cover of Sports Illustrated and I haven't heard anything out of him since.

And even though Brown still will be recognized by most people as the greatest running back ever, his name won't hold that cherished top position.

Athletes are no different than most people in other walks of life. Everyone would like to "be somebody" and be remembered, and athletes have a better chance than most of us of accomplishing that goal. Who can blame someone who has a chance of being immortalized in a record book for going for it?

Good luck Pete. Years from now, the record book won't say that you hung on to set the hits record — it'll just say you have it.

Ballesteros tees up for American tour

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Masters champion Seve Ballesteros, the young Spaniard who has dominated European golf in recent years, starts his first full American campaign this week in the $400,000 Los Angeles Open.

"I do not come to challenge anyone, or to prove anything. I come to play golf as well as I can, maybe learn some things," Ballesteros said after a practice round for the tournament that begins today on the 6,946-yard Riviera Country Club course.

Seve, who has won more than 30 international titles including two Masters and two other American titles, joins the U.S. circuit as the principal beneficiary of what has come to be called "the Ballesteros Rule."

That's an adjustment in Pro Golfers' Association Tour regulations, effective this year, which lifts restrictions on the number of foreign events in which non-American members of the tour can compete.

"I think (PGA Tour Commissioner) Deane Beman and the members of the (Policy Board) committee for making the change in the rules that allow me to play here," Ballesteros said.

"The best players, the best courses, the best weather is here in the United States. If all those things were in Europe, maybe I stay in Europe."

"But they are here. So I come here."

A former British Open champion and winner of two titles in the United States last year, Ballesteros said he expects to compete in a minimum of 15 American Tour events this season, and a dozen or more overseas.

He said he had planned to start his American campaign in Florida two weeks from now, but added the Los Angeles tournament to his schedule because he likes the Riviera course. He said he expects to play in this country through the Masters in April, and will return later in the season.

Ballesteros, winner of two titles and $210,933 in only eight American starts last season, said he is "very pleased with my game right now."

"If I am not ready, I am very close to being ready."

Opposing him in the chase for a $72,000 first prize is the strongest field of the young season. It includes Jack Nicklaus, making his second start of the year, and Tom Watson.

Watson, who has missed three cuts in a row and is mired in the worst slump of his career, withdrew from the Wednesday pro-am competition with an injured finger, but said he would play in the tournament.

Other major figures include Hal Sutton, who won the PGA title on this course last fall, defending champion Gil Morgan, U.S. Open titleholder Larry Nelson, Ray Floyd, Lee Trevino, Johnny Miller, Hale Irwin, Fuzzy Zoeller and 1984 title winners Gary Koch, Tom Purtzer, Jack Renner and John Mahaffey.

Portions of the final two rounds Saturday and Sunday will be televised nationally by CBS.

Women's cage team to battle Lady 'Buffs

In the first of two home games this week, the Lady 'Cats basketball squad will play host to the University of Colorado Lady 'Buffs at 7:30 p.m. today in Ahearn Field House.

K-State, now 16-5 overall and 6-2 in Big Eight Conference play, is currently ranked 12th in the nation. Last week the squad suffered a 66-62 loss to the University of Missouri and posted a 71-62 victory over the University of Oklahoma.

Ninth-ranked Missouri takes over first place in the league with a 7-1 record, followed by K-State and the University of Kansas Lady Jayhawks. KU's 6-2 record ties the Lady 'Cats for second place in the league standings.

Colorado currently stands 9-13 overall and 3-5 in the Big Eight. The Lady 'Buffs conference victories came against Oklahoma (66-62), the University of Nebraska (91-77) and Iowa State University (68-65). They lost to Oklahoma State University (72-63, 77-76), Missouri (105-63), Kansas (72-51) and K-State.

In the squads' first meeting, the Lady 'Cats grabbed a 77-55 win at Boulder. Sophomore Jennifer Jones led the attack with 23 points, while junior Angie Bonner and freshman Carlisa Thomas took rebounding honors with 11 each. Jones also was the Lady 'Cats leading scorer in their recent 71-62 victory over Oklahoma.

The Lady 'Buffs are lead by the outside shooting of senior guard Diane Hiemstra and the inside play of senior Julie Hoehning and junior Patty Slighter. Hiemstra averages 17.9 points per game for Colorado, while Hoehning and Slighter contribute 10.8 and 10.4, respectively. Slighter canned 16 points in the two squads' first encounter this season.

But it's Hiemstra and the outside play of the Lady 'Buffs that concerns K-State Head Coach Lynn Hickey, who watched Colorado grab an 84-67 upset victory in Boulder last season.

"Colorado has a really good player in Hiemstra," Hickey said. "We are going to have to stop their outside game."

K-State will be lead by the double-figure scoring of Bonner, Jennifer Jones and Cassandra Jones. Bonner averages 13.6 points a game while both Jennifer Jones and Cassandra Jones add 11.8 per contest.

USD 383 superintendent resigns

By DIANE KERSTING
Collegian Reporter

On June 30, the resignation of James Benjamin, superintendent of Manhattan Unified School District No. 383, will take effect. Benjamin, 52, who has held the post for eight years, announced his resignation Feb. 3.

"I've just wanted to do something else," Benjamin said.

Although a change of jobs is on the horizon for Benjamin, he said he is not yet "prepared to announce" his future plans. He said he plans to remain in the Manhattan area and continue his community activities and "writing as an advocate."

"I enjoy my work. I've enjoyed my time here. Since I had one more year on my contract, I could have stayed, but I feel that it's a time in my life when I want to do something else, yet I'll never say that I won't ever do it again."

"The reality of this is that I've done it before (resigned from another position) and became a professor at Pan Am University," he said.

Benjamin was a professor there before coming to Manhattan in 1976. He has also been a school superintendent at Augusta, Winfield and Denton, Texas, during the 25 years he has held the top position in school districts.

Although major accomplishments — a new transportation system, curriculum changes, a building program and remedial education projects — have been achieved during Benjamin's years at the helm, he said he takes no credit for them.

"The school is a system of teachers and supporters whose responsibility is to implement and carry out procedures," Benjamin said. "They are not my accomplishments. They are the accomplishments of the people of Manhattan, the teachers and the Board of Education."

Although Benjamin will no longer be superintendent after June, he said his interest in the education of young people will continue.

"Obviously, I'm one who feels that the priority for the education of young people is very important, and the community has been very supportive of this," Benjamin said. "The schools are only as good as we want them to be. If the expectations aren't kept high or raised, the school's quality will be lowered."

"One thing that has happened is that education has depended on attracting women because other professions weren't open to them. But the last 10 to 15 years have changed this," he said. "Now, bright women are choosing other professions and, unless the pay is made competitive, the area of education will be hurt."

"The pay of teachers ought to be on a par with other professions with the same degree of training. It's not now, but I hope that the willingness to pay teachers for their expertise will increase. This would be better for attracting teachers, especially in certain areas such as business and math," Benjamin said.

As for Benjamin's successor, the USD 383 school board is beginning to establish procedures to start a search for a new superintendent. Benjamin said he has offered his assistance, but doesn't want to select the replacement.

"Manhattan is a very good school system," Benjamin said. "I'd like to see it strengthened in the years to come."

Board President Roger Reitz said the district will miss Benjamin's services.

"He's an excellent member of our administrative team," Reitz said. "I'm sorry to see him leave, but understand his desire for a change in his life. It's a tough job and it's not getting any easier because there are so many demands and so much pressure."

"But I feel we've accomplished a lot since he's been here," Reitz said.

Research center to prosper upon death of wealthy dog

By The College Press Service

AUBURN, Ala. — Auburn University is waiting for a dog to die.

When the 16-year-old canine, now suffering from heartworms, dies, the university will inherit over $12 million.

The bizarre deathwatch came about because of an oil heiress's love for dogs and because her veterinarian's son happened to go to Auburn 20 years ago.

Musketeer, the dying dog, is the last survivor of some 150 stray dogs adopted during the last years of Eleanor Ritchey. Ritchey was heiress to the fortune of the family that founded Quaker State Oil Company.

In her will, Ritchey bequeathed her estate, then worth about $4 million, to the dogs. When the last of the dogs die, the will stipulates the estate — now worth over $12 million — should go to Auburn's animal research center.

When composing her will in the mid-1960s, however, Ritchey had no specific research center in mind. So she "asked her veterinarian if he knew of a good animal research center she could donate the money to," Auburn spokesman Roy Summerford said.

The veterinarian didn't, but had a son enrolled at Auburn at the time. He called Auburn to ask if it had a research center, and found out it had the Scott Research Program. Upon hearing of his discovery, Ritchey decided to write Auburn's name into her will.

At the time, Ritchey had about 150 dogs at her Fort Lauderdale, Fla., mansion, taken in "to overcome her loneliness," Summerford said.

When Ritchey died in 1968, she left a $4.5 million estate to the dogs and, eventually, the research center.

In the interim, inflation and the Florida land boom have increased the value of the estate's holdings to more than $12 million.

"Now Musketeer is the only remaining dog, and he is supposedly in progressively bad health," Summerford said. "The dog has trouble walking because of old age and also has a bad case of heartworms."

Musketeer, along with his 149 now-deceased brethren, lived at a special Fort Lauderdale kennel built with the proceeds from Ritchey's fortune.

Auburn, in truth, has been earning interest on the fortune since the early 1970s. It currently nets about $960,000 a year from the special trust fund.

In 1979, some of the interest money went to build the first stage of a $1.6 million research center, now renamed the Scott-Ritchey Research Program. A second $2 million stage is now planned for the campus, Summerford said. Interest from the trust fund also will pay for the second stage.

Gemayel scraps withdrawal pact with Israel

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — President Amin Gemayel has agreed to scrap Lebanon's U.S.-brokered troop withdrawal pact with Israel, Beirut radio reported, in an effort to save his disintegrating army and government.

The state radio said Thursday night that Gemayel had agreed to an eight-point Saudi peace initiative that includes renouncing the May 17, 1983, agreement between Lebanon and Israel. It added that Foreign Minister Elie Salem had communicated the decision to Saudi officials in Riyadh.

The development came as the Syrian-supported Druse and Moslem militias stepped up military and political pressure

Thursday to oust Gemayel, who turned to Saudi Arabia to salvage his crumbling position.

Druse militiamen pushed the Lebanese army out of the Chouf Mountains and rolled down the coastal hills to link up with Shiite Moslem allies controlling west Beirut.

At their camps in the capital, U.S. Marines and Italian troops were packing their equipment and preparing to pull out.

A senior White House official said the Marines would begin withdrawing to U.S. Navy ships off the Lebanese coast in two or three days. The official, who spoke on condition he not be named, said the redeployment of about 1,200 Marines should be completed within 30 days from today.

He said 500 personnel — Marines, Army trainers and others — would stay in Beirut to guard the U.S. Embassy and perform other functions.

Earlier in the day, American officials in Washington expressed skepticism that the Saudi-mediated plan would work. Druse opposition leader Walid Jumblatt said in an interview he would veto it. He called it "too little, too late."

"There will never be a compromise with us and Gemayel," Jumblatt said in the telephone interview from Damascus, Syria, which was broadcast by Independent Television News in London. "Gemayel is to be judged for crimes against the Lebanese people... There is no way to have a deal with Gemayel."

Beirut radio said Gemayel received two telephone calls late Thursday, one from his foreign minister, Salem, in Saudi Arabia, the other from Saudi mediator Rafik Hariri, telling him Saudi Arabia had received Lebanon's go-ahead. It said Saudi Foreign Minister Prince Saud al-Faisal would fly to Damascus on today to obtain Syria's approval.

The radio report said Gemayel had informed the parties to the national reconciliation conference of details of the Saudi initiative and sent a written message about his decision to former President Suleiman Franjeh, a member of the National Salvation Front that includes Jumblatt and former Prime Minister Rashid Karami.

In Tel Aviv, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir said abrogation of the Israel-

Lebanon accord would jeopardize any future peace agreements between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

The Druse and Shiite fighters, expanding their control along the coast south of the capital, on Thursday captured the fishing town of Damour and the neighboring hilltop barracks of the rightist Christian Phalange Party.

An estimated 800 to 1,000 Lebanese soldiers — the remnants of the army's 4th Brigade routed in the Chouf battle Tuesday — were evacuated by boat from the coastal town of Jiye, south of Damour, to the Christian port of Jounieh north of Beirut. Sources at the army command said there were no army units left in the area.

State drinking bills prompt local reply

By LUCY REILLY
Collegian Reporter

(Editor's note: This is the second of two articles about local reaction to three bills currently being considered in the Kansas Legislature relating to alcohol consumption in the state. The first dealt with opposition to the bills.)

Supporters of increasing the minimum age to 21 for alcohol consumption in Kansas are prevalent in Manhattan.

Three bills currently being considered in the Kansas Legislature are proposing to increase the legal age to 21, eliminate "drink and drown" nights, and limit on-premises beer drinking to taverns for people 18 to 20 years old.

Even if the legal drinking age is raised to 21, minors would still manage to acquire alcohol, Al-Anon member Margaret Anthony said. Anthony said her husband has been a member of Alcoholics Anonymous since 1957.

"I'm in favor of raising the legal drinking age to 21, but I still don't think it's going to do any good," Anthony said.

Many people would like to see an eradication to the "drink and drown" nights. Pushing someone into meaningless intoxication leads to getting into trouble with alcohol, said Dr. Sam Lacy of Lafene Student Health Center. Lacy is a member of Physicians for Social Responsibility.

"I'm not sure about this proposal. We've had prohibition before, and it didn't help control sensible drinking then," he said. "It isn't clear to me that raising the drinking age would promote sensible drinking."

In December, after 18 months of deliberation, President Reagan's Commission on Drunken Driving asked Congress to raise the national drinking age to 21.

"There is evidence of a direct correlation between the minimum drinking age and alcohol-related crashes among the age groups affected," the commission said.

The National Safety Council of Chicago estimated approximately 23,000 deaths in 1982 were alcohol-related, while a report by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration discovered that eight states who have raised the drinking age to 21 have had an average of 28 percent annual decrease in nighttime fatal accidents involving 18- to 20-year old drivers.

Many advocates of omitting the "drink and drown" nights admit that they think attempting to raise the legal age to 21 is fruitless.

"The drinking age should be left at 18," Rev. Harold Mitchell of the Manhattan Church of Christ said.

House favors tax-break bill for Kansans

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas House Thursday gave first-round approval to a bill which gives Kansas taxpayers an extra $100 break on their individual income tax.

The measure started out as a proposal to change the way taxes are assessed on corporate liquidations. However, Rep. Robin Leach, D-Linwood, said it was time to give individual income taxpayers a break after last year, when the Legislature approved a record $206 million in tax increases.

"All this amendment does is raise the corporate income tax a small percent and give the Kansas individual income taxpayer a break," Leach said. "It wouldn't cost the state general fund anything. In fact, there would be a $100,000 increase in the general fund."

However, the House only accepted half of Leach's proposal. On a roll-call vote, the proposal to raise corporate taxes $8.9 million failed with only 49 favoring the tax and 75 opposed.

The other half of Leach's bill, to increase the individual income tax exemption to $1,100 from its current $1,000 level passed by an overwhelming 123-1 vote. Only Rep. Jack Shriver, D-Arkansas City, voted against the income tax break, which will cost $8.9 million. The state income tax exemption has not been changed since 1979.

The issue was strictly partisan and all 49 votes in favor of the corporate tax increase were Democrats. Of the 75 votes against raising the corporate tax, all but four were Republicans. The Democrats voting with the GOP against the tax increase were Reps. Gary Blumenthal of Merriam, Larry Ernie of Coffeyville, Charles Laird of Topeka and Kathryn Sughrue of Dodge City.

Several Republicans said it would be a poor decision to raise corporate taxes when the state is trying to lure

Callers offer free products to University greeks

By KARRA PORTER
Staff Writer

Recently most of the greek houses at K-State have received an offer too good to be true — at least thought it was.

The houses received telephone calls from representatives of a company called AMPM, which claims to be based in Los Angeles.

"Nearly every house has mentioned that they have had a call (from AMPM)," Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said.

Doug Barton, president of Phi Delta Theta fraternity and junior in journalism and mass communications, said his house got a call from an AMPM representative about two weeks ago.

"They call and say they're a non-profit organization that puts out electronic products such as Beta Maxes," he said. "They say they're going out of business, and they're sending stuff to other non-profit organizations, and all you have to do is pay the shipping charges."

In similar incidents in Manhattan and on other college campuses, the "shipping charges," which are c.o.d. (cash on delivery), have amounted to about $39. What a person gets in return for his money is uncertain.

Marvin Roth, Manhattan postmaster, said that before calls began coming to the fraternities and sororities, similar calls were made to some businesses and individuals in Manhattan.

"The operation is the same, except that the name has been changed," he said.

In some cases, Manhattan businesses responded to the call and a package was mailed, paid for and empty.

"After one or two people opened them and found nothing inside, word spread fast," Roth said.

Different schemes have been run in Manhattan by different companies, he said.

"Most people said they got a call, and the people (calling) said, 'We're going to be sending you a prize,'" he said. "And what happens is that inside the package is an order form or information about paying the rest of the bill."

Roth said that since December he has received more calls about questionable mail practices than he has in the past two years. Incidents such as the one just described involve legal deception, he said, but he can't say yet whether the AMPM calls to the K-State fraternities and sororities are illegal or not.

"It could be this company is on the up-and-up. I can't state that this is illegal. Perhaps it is legal. I can just say that it doesn't look good on the outside."

Robel said she believes the AMPM calls are not legitimate. She was notified in January by some friends who are advisers at other universities about a scam pulled on some greek organizations on other campuses. Robel passed the information on to K-State organizations through the Interfraternity Council newsletter a few days later.

A short time later K-State greek houses began to receive telephone calls from AMPM.

Barton said the residents of his house had read the newsletter and were wary when the representative from AMPM called.

To find out more about the company, a Phi Delta Theta member asked the caller some questions about the offer, Barton said.

"He (the AMPM representative) said, 'We'll just mail you some information on it,'" Barton said. "We haven't heard back from them yet. We're hoping they don't just send us the Beta Max."

Barton said he has instructed everyone in the house not to pay the charges if the package arrives.

If a consumer pays the c.o.d. shipping charges, he's out of the money, Roth said. Once the post office has collected the c.o.d. payment, it is required to forward payment to the company.

"When you (a company) send something c.o.d., we ask you how much you want to charge. You say $38. So we charge you $38, plus the mailing fee," Roth said. "We collect the c.o.d., and we put it into the post office account. Then we write a post office money order to the company."

When a consumer changes his mind about paying the c.o.d. charges and stops paying on the check, he is actually trying to stop payment to the U.S. Postal Service rather than the company, Roth said.

"Technically and legally, they can't (stop payment on the check)," he said. "Although we (the post office) are becoming a separate business of sorts, we are still part of the U.S. government."

Roth said that in those instances only the company comes out ahead. By the time the post office takes action, the fraudulent company has moved on, he said.

"You rent a post office box, run a scheme, make some money, and then disappear," he said.

Repeated attempts to contact a representative of AMPM to clarify their offer were unsuccessful.

Mondale leads Iowa poll; Jackson, Glenn at No. 2

By The Associated Press

DES MOINES, Iowa — With only one weekend to go before the presidential nomination season begins in earnest with the Iowa precinct caucuses, a poll published Thursday showed the Rev. Jesse Jackson has caught up with Sen. John Glenn in the fight for second place behind front-runner Walter F. Mondale.

Mondale, the heavy favorite to win the balloting Monday night in Iowa, returned to the state Thursday for a final push.

Sen. Gary Hart of Colorado also brought his campaign here for a final four-day push designed to boost his own claim as Mondale's prime challenger. Former South Dakota Sen. George McGovern and former Florida Gov. Reubin Askew also crisscrossed the state in search of votes.

Jackson, meanwhile, campaigned in New Hampshire while saying he is "inclined" to accept the Sandinista government invitation and travel to Nicaragua next week.

The latest Gallup Poll put Mondale where he has been for the past several months — far ahead of the other Democratic hopefuls. In the survey conducted Feb. 10-12, Mondale had the backing of 49 percent of the 521 Democrats interviewed.

This survey said Jackson has the backing of 14 percent of those interviewed, compared to 13 percent for Glenn.

The latest Gallup survey put all the rest of the pack in the 2-to-3 percent category.

Soviet official endorses Chernenko

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Mikhail S. Gorbachev gave crucial endorsement to Konstantin U. Chernenko and is now the No. 2 man in the Kremlin, a highly placed Soviet source says.

The 52-year-old agriculture specialist, the youngest man on the ruling Politburo, was reputed to be Yuri V. Andropov's choice as successor.

With Chernenko selected to lead the country as general secretary of the Communist Party, Gorbachev's powerful new role was first suggested by his position next to Chernenko at ceremonies in honor of the late Andropov.

Then it was announced on television Wednesday night that Gorbachev had made a previously undisclosed statement at the Central Committee plenum Monday that named Chernenko leader.

Gorbachev's statement appears in a brochure of speeches obtained by

The Associated Press Thursday in advance of publication. The brochure indicated Gorbachev, speaking "on behalf of the Politburo," closed the meeting with an endorsement of Chernenko. In order to carry out such a role at the plenum, Gorbachev would most certainly have to be in a leading position in the 12-man Politburo.

The Communist Party newspaper Pravda, meanwhile, laid out a conservative course for the party in a front-page editorial that set the tone for Chernenko's first months in power. Pravda made clear that there would be no relaxation of Soviet bloc unity under Chernenko, who traditionally endorsed the doctrine of his mentor, Brezhnev, that there should be no liberal experiments in the Soviet bloc.

A Western diplomat speculated that Gorbachev's endorsement of Chernenko meant there was an implicit recognition within the Kremlin leadership that his backing was necessary to win Chernenko the post. A highly placed Soviet source told a Western delegation in Moscow for Andropov's funeral Tuesday that Gorbachev was now, effectively, the Kremlin's No. 2 man.

Chernenko's policies were outlined in detail on Thursday in a two-column editorial running the length of the front page of Pravda.

The bulk of the article was devoted to domestic issues and made clear that the party under Chernenko would continue to enforce Andropov's watchwords of increased efficiency, order and discipline.

On foreign policy, Pravda said the Soviet Union will work with "all states that are prepared to help by practical deeds to lessen international tension."

But it held out little hope that superpower relations, which deteriorated to their lowest point in decades under Andropov, would improve soon.

TV series to air professor's stress tips

By SHARI ALBRECHT
Collegian Reporter

A K-State professor's quick, tension-relieving exercises have attracted the attention of the producers of ABC's "Good Morning America" television show.

The producers flew David Danskin, professor of student development and counseling psychologist to New York City during the last week in January for an interview with Bruce Jenner, 1976 Olympic decathlon winner.

The show's producers and writers have been consulting with Danskin since mid-December for a five-segment show on wellness to be broadcast Monday through Friday. Jenner is the narrator for the series.

Danskin will be seen nationally Wednesday between 7:30 and 8 a.m. on Channel 49 from Topeka.

Danskin said he has consulted with the writers for about 30 hours by telephone, in addition to making the tape in New York.

The series discusses nutrition, self-care, stress management, fitness and the social aspects of wellness. Danskin's role has been in the segment on stress management.

"It's not the big things in life that cause so much stress — such as a divorce or losing a job — but it's the little things that we overreact to with more tension than we need to," Danskin said.

He said these "little things" happen about 150 times a day.

"The alarm goes off. You lean over to shut it off and decide to lay in bed a few more minutes. Then you awake to discover that class starts in 10 minutes. You hurry to get ready to run out the door and you tense up and your heart beats faster. As you're driving to campus, you remember there's going to be a quiz in class today. You overreact and tense your shoulders and neck and feel tight. Next, as you happen to hit the red traffic lights, you tense up again.

"Finally, when you get to campus, there's no place to park, so once again you tense up your jaw, neck and shoulders."

This kind of steady off-and-on tension wears people down, Danskin said. "It takes about 20 minutes for a muscle to relax due to an over-tensed reaction."

He said if people counteract the tension with some quick strategy exercises throughout the day, they would feel and perform better.

For the show, Danskin and Jenner visited Foxrun, a women's apparel store in New York, where Danskin explained some of his quick-strategy exercises to sewing-machine operators to help them relieve tension from their job.

He told them to take a deep breath, hold it for three seconds, and let it out all at once.

"As you let it out, let your jaw relax, your shoulders relax and think 'calm,'" Danskin said. "We should go through the day with enough space between our front teeth for a small pencil."

Another exercise he taught the sewing machine operators was to pull their toes up as if to touch their shins.

"Hold that while you tighten your thighs, tighten your buttocks, take a deep breath and hold it," he said. "Tense your arms and fists, close your eyes and tense your jaws. Hold it for five seconds. Then, let it go all at once and feel the tension draining from your body."

Danskin and Jenner also visited a Federal Express Center where three dispatchers were taking calls from customers and drivers.

To relieve some of their stress, Danskin told them to smile widely and to make their eyes sparkle.

"Then take a big breath," he said. "As you let it out, let your jaw hang slack, your shoulders sag and your forehead smooth out. This breaks up a lot of the tensions we make in ourselves when under stress, when our face gets hard looking, we breathe only in the upper part of our chest, tense our jaws and shoulders and wrinkle our brow." Danskin said he calls this the "Super 4 S" exercise: smile, slack jaw, slack shoulders and smooth forehead.

Another quick strategy exercise he taught began with tensing shoulder and back muscles and holding this position for eight counts.

Then, the shoulders are raised, rolled back and forth and dropped. "Do this five times, keeping your shoulders relaxed and jaw hanging loose," he said.

While Jenner drove through busy city traffic, Danskin was videotaped inside the car teaching him how to perform personal stress management exercises that can be done while driving a car.

"You can grip the wheel tighter, hold for three seconds and release," Danskin said. "Also, you can do equalized breathing by taking four seconds of breath in and four seconds of breath out, repeating five times."

Danskin said he believes these quick strategy exercises "could be done every hour of the day to relieve the overreaction of tensions we have about 150 times a day."

"There will always be some amount of tension throughout the day, but we can relieve a lot of it by doing these quick exercises," he said. "How often you do these exercises depends on you and how you handle stress; whether you get uptight or stay calm. Research suggests that if we are more relaxed, we can concentrate better, absorb information more efficiently and remember more."

Student Senate nixes budget-review measure

By PAUL ENGLISH
Collegian Reporter

Student Publications, Recreational Services and the Union will continue to have extensive budget reviews every three years as the result of action by Student Senate last night.

Sensors defeated a bill on a roll call vote, 26-25, which would have changed the current three-year budget review system for major line items to five years.

Because the extensive review process is very complicated, a five-year plan would be more feasible, Jerry Katlin, student body president, said.

Brian O'Neill, graduate senator, said he objected to the bill because these groups receive a large share of student fees and should have more supervision.

"We have a situation here where $7 out of $10 goes to these three organizations," he said. "What has been a trend in Senate is to concern ourselves less with these $7 and balance our budget on the other $3."

O'Neill said that the smaller groups, which are reviewed yearly, are subjected to more scrutiny than the major line item groups such as the Union.

"These small groups have been pummeled to death on budget requests," he said. "Student Senate spends too much time picking up nickels and dimes off the sidewalk and letting the $100 bills go flying by. This is very unfair to these groups."

Mark Terril, former Finance Committee chairman, said changing to a five-year review plan would loosen student control on the money given to these groups.

"I'd like to see their money reviewed at least once during a person's stay in college," he said. "There are going to be some tough budget decisions to be made this year, and you don't loosen control when things get tough."

Kirk Porteous, Finance Committee chairman, said there was adequate accountability in major line-item groups to make a five-year review acceptable. These groups go through many checkpoints because they receive their funding from a variety of sources, he said.

Bill Sullivan, graduate senator, said if the three groups estimated their budgets for five years instead of three, budgeting inaccuracies would cause these groups to ask Senate for approximately an additional $600,000 over 15 years.

Katlin said Sullivan's figures were wrong, pointing out that groups would request funds to cover the average five-year cost, rather than the highest expense year, eliminating Sullivan's predicted budget increase.

Coleman enjoys work on trade council

By DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian Reporter

Brown-patterned wallpaper adorns the walls of his simple office. There is nothing hanging on the walls, nothing to provide any hint as to the character of the man. His desk and the shelves immediately behind it, however, tell a different story.

The desk is cluttered with business briefs from around the world and the shelves contain several books, magazines and other loose papers.

"Things get lost very easily around here — especially on my desk," he said.

Profile

Ray Coleman

Ray Coleman is indeed a busy man, and busy men don't often have time to organize the papers on their desks or to hang things on the walls of their offices. Coleman said he prefers to leave the interior decorating to his wife, who just happens to make it a living.

Coleman, professor of marketing and director of the campus-based International Trade Council of Mid-America, is at home in this office. It is here that he works on trade-related matters for which he has become internationally known. He was featured as "KSU's Trade Ambassador" in a cover story in the May 1983 issue of Kansas Business News magazine.

Manhattan hasn't always been home for Coleman. He was born 60 years ago in Bonner Springs, a small town outside of Lawrence. The University of Kansas was just a stone's throw away, and it was there that Coleman started his college education.

Following his freshman year, Coleman joined the Naval Air Corps as a fighter pilot. He was active for three years during World War II.

"I was working for just $1 a day during the time I was in high school and for the first year I was in college," Coleman said. "The Navy was advertising that it was paying $220 a month, and I didn't think it would be possible to spend that much. The money was probably the biggest reason I joined the Navy."

Coleman returned to KU after his stint in the military.

"I got my marketing degree because I thought it proper that I get an undergraduate degree — from the economic standpoint, it was the logical thing," he said. "But the real reason I went back to school is that I have always felt that learning is an exciting experience."

It was his love for learning that brought Coleman into the profession of education 20 years ago. He didn't go into teaching immediately, but after 15 years of work in private business, he heard the call of the classroom once again.

"I really enjoyed working with the students when I was still teaching," Coleman said. He has not taught since his duties at the council were expanded four years ago.

"Even today, I think I can do a good job advising students. After I find their interests, I can normally guide them in the right direction. I love working with students who know what they can do and want to see it through," he said.

As much as Coleman loved working with students while he was still teaching, he may love his work at the council even more.

"I have really enjoyed my work in the area of international trade," he said. "When I started in this area, international trade policy was chaotic, and I didn't believe that there was enough input and influence from the heartland of the United States. I think that is changing."

In an attempt to make the Midwest a more influential trade center, Coleman has spearheaded a plan to establish an international trade information center here.

"In our efforts to help small businesses interact in the international marketplace, we want to set up a specialized center that will provide these businesses a wealth of information at one location — a Midwestern location," Coleman said.

In addition, Coleman's forces also counsel students from across Kansas who are interested in the international marketplace. Thus, he is still involved with students on a one-to-one basis.

"I believe that students, regardless of major, need a strong international background," he said. "I tell that to everyone I advise."

Coleman didn't come to this conclusion by chance — he has lived it. Through his work in international trade, Coleman has interacted with leaders of many nations.

"Over the years I've had many foreign guests, and in almost every country there is someone I know or have met," he said.

"I would hope that I've been able to provide people with knowledge and perceptions that will enable them to be good people as well as good contributors to their community," he said. "I believe that personal interaction is important, for often in life we say things too late."

Federal proposal may cripple state student aid

By The College Press Service

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Student aid experts here are scrambling to beat back an obscure bill that, if passed in a few weeks, could severely hurt most state student aid programs.

Congress has scheduled a March vote on a measure that could deny countless students the opportunity for a college education by crippling state student loan programs, the aid experts contend.

State and college loan officials nationwide are working to block the legislation, now pending in the U.S. House of Representatives, before it comes to a vote.

The bill, known as HR 4170, has already virtually eliminated tax-exempt financing for student loans by placing a cap on the number of tax-exempt student bonds each state can issue.

At risk is almost $3 billion worth of student loans.

States have been issuing such bonds for a long time, but the bonds have become even more important fund-raising tools since Washington began slashing the amounts of money it gave to the states to distribute as aid to students.

Under the bond system, citizens buy bonds from the state, which then uses the money from the sale of the bonds to loan to students.

As students repay the state, the state pays interest to the citizens who bought the bonds. The citizens don't have to pay taxes on the interest they earn from the state.

The new bill before Congress would limit the bond selling and would lump student aid bonds in the same finance category as tax-exempt industrial revenue bonds.

Consequently, student loan agencies will be forced to compete with private corporations for bond business, aid officials say.

"There's no question that the legislation would be very crippling," said Jean Frolichsen, general counsel for the National Council of Higher Education Loan Programs in Washington, D.C.

Tax-exempt student aid bonds also are the cornerstone of the so-called "secondary" student loan market. Special state agencies issue the bonds to raise money, which they in turn use to purchase delinquent and unpaid student loans from "primary" lenders, such as banks and savings and loans.

"What the secondary market does is purchase loans from these primary institutions so they can make more loans to other students," Frolichsen said.

"It's a matter of freeing up more capital for more loans, and if the secondary market dries up, it will have a dramatic effect on the primary market," she said.

If banks and other primary lenders lost the option of selling their "sour" student loans to secondary state agencies, aid officials stress, they would cut back drastically on student loans in general, and specifically on loans to lower- and middle-income students.

HR 4170 proposes to limit tax-exempt student aid bonds by grouping them with industrial revenue bonds and allowing states to issue no more than $150 per capita of both kinds of bonds.

The House Ways and Means Committee, which drafted the bill, "is concerned about the growing number of tax-exempt bonds being issued for essentially private purposes," Bruce Davie, committee spokesman, said.

The federal government wants the tax money people avoid paying when they buy the tax-exempt bonds.

"The use of tax-exempt bonds erodes the revenues of the federal government and drives up interest rates," Davie said.

But only $220 million — or one percent — of the fiscal 1983 federal deficit was due to tax-exempt student loan bonds, said Grier Davis, director of institutional relations at Northwestern University.

In addition, Davis said, student aid bonds "serve a clear public purpose by providing money for students' educations and should not be grouped with industrial revenue bonds."

Nationally, state agencies issue about $3 billion in student aid bonds each year, Frolichsen said, and countless numbers of financially-strapped students are aided both directly and indirectly by the capital they pump into the student aid market.

But "nothing restricts the loan money to students who are needy," Davie said. "Some of the bond money is used by individual, private colleges who are in a position, essentially, of offering cheap credit to parents of students who don't want to cash in their money markets (investments) to pay tuition."

Presidential results make history

Congratulations to the 2,450 students who believe helping to choose the student body president is worth five minutes of their time.

This number is higher than last year's run-off election between Jerry Katlin and Mike Gibson, in which 2,316 students voted.

Voter turn-out results were pleasantly surprising, considering the fact that the campaigns for student body president were comparatively "quiet," with no issues students immediately opposed.

In fact, the number of students who voted in the student body president run-off election Wednesday is the highest since the 1978 election, in which 3,031 students voted.

In addition, this seemingly small number is the fourth largest voter response to a presidential run-off election since 1970, when Pat Bosco, now assistant vice president of student affairs, became student body president.

It is important to note that approximately 13 percent of the student body chose to help decide which candidate would represent students to K-State administration, alumni and visitors, as well as the Board of Regents, for the 1984-85 academic year.

Although this is a small percent of the student population, it represents those who care about what is happening in student government.

The result of voting is the election of a leader believed by voters to be qualified for the position. Those who voted in both the general and the run-off elections should be commended for taking the time and showing the interest to vote.

A positive idea for city schools

Robert Anderson, principal of Marlatt Elementary School, has taken a progressive step toward improving primary and secondary school education in Manhattan.

At a program Tuesday night at the Riley County Historical Museum dealing with the quality of education, Anderson proposed a system of cooperation between local schools and K-State in which some University professors would periodically deliver science lectures and give demonstrations in Manhattan schools.

Such a program could only improve schooling for local children. Although to initiate such a program would require much cooperation and communication on the part of select University professors and Manhattan Unified School District No. 383 administrators, its benefits would outweigh any costs involved. For students to be exposed to University educators at an early age could increase their desire to learn and encourage them to consider earning a college degree. Professors also might find it challenging and refreshing to address an audience younger than the typical college class.

Such a program also could enhance relations between the University and the city of Manhattan. For K-State to share educational opportunity with local schools would foster regard and respect between the University community and Manhattan residents.

James Benjamin, superintendent of USD 383, agreed at the meeting that "the quality of our schools could be better." Ultimately, however, the superintendent could be the decisive figure in not only sponsoring such a program of science instruction, but ensuring its workability and success. Benjamin's support before his resignation becomes effective June 30 is crucial in promoting such a learning exchange.

Anderson's proposal deserves attentive consideration from all Manhattan residents as well, whether related to the University or not, as a positive step toward quality education for local children.

"FASTER! GET THE LEAD OUT!"

Dole-Dole standoff creates stir

WASHINGTON — It wasn't only the Lebanese crisis and its sense of futility that created a ruckus in Washington last week. The Hill crowd also was intrigued by the testimony of the Secretary of Transportation before the Senate Finance Committee on the highway users' tax.

Washington's "power couple" — Elizabeth and (Kansas' own) Robert Dole — staged a Washington first when they became the premiere husband and wife holding major national offices to take each other on in the federal committee hearing boxing ring.

Secretary of State George Shultz's appearance before the House Foreign Affairs committee during the same week fighting intensified in the Middle East didn't draw the cameras, reporters or spectators that the Dole-Dole extravaganza did.

Lines were forming outside the committee room an hour before the scheduled 2 p.m. hearing, and once inside, observers filled up the chairs, floor space and window sills.

Photographers are few at most committee hearings, but the barrage of camera flashes that hit the Doles as they entered the meeting chamber could have sunburned them both.

Meanwhile, simultaneous murmurs of "Here's the happy couple" wafted across the open room in a more or less cordial tone. But the trucking lobbyist standing next to me — obviously worried that Secretary Dole's report might be less than favorable toward the trucking industry — reiterated the phrase in a much more caustic manner.

Following the mini-photo session, the Doles took their seats. Face to face — he behind the chairman's bench and she at the witness table — the federal-marital encounter began.

"Madame Secretary, it is a pleasure to have you with us this afternoon to report to us on this important issue concerning the tax on highway users," Chairman Dole managed to say with a semi-straight face, while the crowd chuckled.

"Mr. Chairman," responded his wife in her modified drawl, "it is indeed a pleasure to come before this impawshul body, and I hope that we will soon reach agreement on this issue in all three houses."

The room exploded. And so the two set the pace for the banter-filled, though brief, hearing that followed.

This was no ordinary committee hearing. It was impossible to forget for even a moment that the Dole husband-wife team were momentary public adversaries. While speaking with the conviction of one who has Congress' best interests in mind, however, Elizabeth Dole staunchly defended her role as a member of the executive branch.

Chairman Dole's concluding one-liner summed up the irony of their situation.

"Well," he said to the secretary as she prepared to leave, "it looks like you're going to get home first tonight. And you know what to do when you get there."

Nicaragua moves to democracy

During an interview in his Managua office last year, one of Nicaragua's strongmen surprised us by what he didn't say.

Carlos Nunez Tellez, a member of the nine-man Sandinista directorate overseeing Nicaragua's transition to democracy, didn't mention that the United States had applied a higher standard of democracy to his country than to many U.S. allies.

That would have been a logical complaint for someone looking for a way out of a promise to hold elections. While Nunez might have been holding back his editorial opinions, we concluded that the Sandinistas were more serious about democracy than Ronald Reagan would have us believe.

But George Shultz, after playing golf in Brazil, saw ominous indications Feb. 5 in Nicaragua's recent decision to postpone consideration of a draft of electoral legislation, originally scheduled for this week. While the Sandinistas justified the delay on evidence of air raids by U.S.-backed rebel forces, Shultz insisted that Managua was "only too ready to back off from elections."

Shultz's denunciation was symptomatic of a consistently belligerent U.S. response to positive steps taken by Nicaragua toward free elections. Within the last year, the Sandinistas have reviewed democratic systems around the world (including that of the United States), drafted procedures for the election of executive and parliamentary officials and devised formulas for aiding opposition parties. They were going to announce an election date on Feb. 21, the 50th anniversary of Augusto Sandino's assassination.

MAXWELL GLEN

Meanwhile, the United States has continued to back rebel incursions into Nicaragua and to bolster its own military presence across the border in Honduras. As Shultz underscored in Brazil, the U.S. posture has been that "an election just as an election really doesn't mean anything. There are elections in the Soviet Union."

One would guess that some officials within Shultz's State Department were embarrassed to hear such wisdom from their boss, since the same could be said of dozens of U.S. allies. Democracy's recent success in Argentina, Spain and Venezuela has masked the Soviet-style electoral shams practiced by numerous Western nations.

There are many unambiguous farces: Chile, Paraguay, South Africa and Zaire are just several of them. When "elections" take place in such countries, the victor always seems to win with 99 percent of the vote. Potential opposition is muzzled, reformism is essentially rhetorical and terms of office are generally measured in coups.

Then there are those authoritarian regimes that are making "progress." In Brazil, for example, a much-heralded "opening" has yet to produce a popular election for president.

Similarly, rumblings in Egypt about possible recognition of the New Wafd party as that country's official parliamentary opposition have only triggered protest from such long-standing political organizations as the Socialist Labor Party, which has been virtually limited to visitor's status in the Egyptian Parliament.

In Turkey, political parties are banned. Haiti's President-for-Life Jean-Claude Duvalier has no tolerance for political opposition.

This isn't to suggest the obvious: that one bad apple justifies another. Though Nicaragua has been held to a higher standard than many of its neighbors, it can only benefit from a strict adherence to democratic reforms and practices.

But the Reagan administration seems adverse to embracing Nicaragua even if democracy emerges there. As three human rights groups argued in a report issued last month, "It is plain...that promotion of human rights in Nicaragua is not the Reagan administration's principal aim." Progress toward free elections, in fact, would not be in the interest of a policy aimed at toppling the Sandinista government.

In that light, the administration's rhetoric about elections in Nicaragua is not only the worst hypocrisy, but also a degradation of democracy itself.

Film review belittles pornography problem

Editor,
Re: Gary Johnson's review, "Feminist film attacks pornography," in the Feb. 16 Collegian:

While Johnson admits that "Not a Love Story" does not present pornographic images "gratuitously or without justification," he seemingly contradicts himself by calling women in our society paranoid. Paranoia (dictionary definition) is characterized by delusions that are ascribed to the supposed hostility of others. If these fears (as can be deduced from pornography and violence against women) are real, then this paranoia is merely reality. Does Klein say that pornography (the symptom) "causes" ills of society or that it is intricately related and encourages the victimization of women?

Additionally, Johnson criticizes Klein for assuming that the majority of pornography film-goers are male. Johnson then implies, without the use of facts, that a large percentage of these movie-goers are women. If Johnson had taken the time to check out the facts, he would find that the majority of pornography and violent movies are geared to male audiences. Additionally, the majority of violent crimes against women are perpetrated by heterosexual males.

The review implies that Johnson does not think that violence against women is a serious enough problem for women and men to be upset about. He implies that it is just those "feminists" trying to put down men again. I suggest that Johnson's reaction to an accurate portrayal of the victimization of women in our society is or could be termed paranoid.

Overdue books do not prevent faculty use

Editor,
Re: Andy Ostmeier's editorial, "Fine solution for overdue books," in the Feb. 15 Collegian:

Ostmeier's editorial on Farrell's overdue policies for faculty needs clarification. The new automated circulation system does not prohibit faculty from checking out additional materials if they have had a book checked out for 111 days. Instead, it flags the records so that library staff can easily resolve overdue problems when the faculty member is at the circulation desk.

In order to avoid these flags, faculty should renew or return those items which appear on first overdue notices. Faculty may either call the library to renew the materials or write "please renew" across the notice and return it to the library.

There is no change in faculty fine and billing charges. Faculty are not fined for overdue books; however, they are and have always been billed for lost books. Books which are not renewed or returned after two notices are automatically considered lost by our computer, and a billing statement is generated and distributed to faculty. Lost book charges are cleared upon renewal or return of the materials.

Library policies for faculty overdues, fines and lost books have not changed. What has changed is the length of the loan period and the frequency with which overdue notices are distributed. The new automated circulation system gives the library the capability to send notices and bills in a timely fashion. Previously, staffing shortages kept manual generation of notices and bills to once a year.

Behavior of fans discrediting

Editor,
Ever since I started following the fortunes of K-State basketball teams as a child, I have been particularly proud of the conduct of our fans.

Wildcat supporters have a reputation for being knowledgeable and demonstrative fans. However, the conduct of about 10 fans on and near Section D's front row during the K-State-Colorado game Wednesday left a lot to be desired.

It's one thing to yell "bull—" with hundreds of other fans, but shouting "Humphries sucks" or "Colorado sucks" while Jay Humphries or other Colorado players shoot free throws really shows a lack of class.

I hope the next time these fans decide to open their mouths in such a way, the campus police will do the rest of the fans a favor and escort these people out the door.

Automation: efficiency spurs increased fears

By DAVID BEVENS
Staff Writer

(Editor's note: This is the second article of a three-part series about high technology in society and its local influence. The last part will deal with how growing technology is affecting family life.)

As high technology expands, the job outlook for many blue-collar workers could become dismal. Automated robotics and machines operated by computer are replacing humans while cutting costs for industry.

"A company has no heart, no soul, no blood running through its veins. All it is interested in is the bottom line, and that is the almighty dollar," Don Northcraft said, referring to industries moving toward automation. Northcraft is the vice president of Local No. 307 of the United Rubber Workers in Topeka.

"Our industry is in the process of automating the plant. We're helpless. We are as helpless as can be," he said.

The best the union and workers can hope for is attrition — the reduction of workers and jobs through retirement or resignation, he said.

"Your American tire manufacturers are losing ground to foreign competition. If you don't compete, you're out of business," said Ray Cunningham, public relations manager of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company in Topeka.

Currently, Goodyear is in first place in the industry. In the past few years a Japanese company has edged into second place. This is because of efficiency from technology, he said.

"The labor change is gradual enough that we don't kick people out the door. We always have a certain amount of attrition," Cunningham said. A significant number of employees haven't been laid off at one time because of automation, he said.

On Jan. 10, Goodyear union employees voted down the company's proposal to add $30 to $40 million dollars of new automation equipment to the plant. Within a week Goodyear laid off 100 union employees. The union wanted another vote because not everyone was informed of the first vote, Cunningham said.

The union members voted again on the issue on Jan. 20. The second vote was overwhelmingly in favor of the proposal.

"We have a lot of automation equipment, but it isn't purely robotic, like the auto plants. The closest to that is an automatic milling machine," he said. The machine is totally operated by computer, he said.

The most disturbing aspect of automation is that the government is using tax dollars to aid corporations in developing new technology that in turn displaces workers, Dennis Strahan said. Strahan is district representative for Lodge No. 70 of the International Association of Machinist and Aerospace Workers (IAMAW) for Boeing Military Aircraft Company in Wichita.

Blue-collar workers supply the government with 80 percent of the national income tax, he said.

"We feel that without something to protect these people (union employees), there will be no money coming out of paychecks to support local, state and federal government. At this point, we see the major part of technology moving in," Strahan said.

Sales taxes on automation equipment would be the primary source of income from industry for government, he said.

Boeing company officials deny that jobs will be lost due to automation, at least this year.

"We only give employment statistics for a year at a time. It's just too early to say," Nancy Robinson, public relations executive for Boeing, said. The company is replacing hazardous and undesirable jobs with robotics and retraining the displaced worker to run the robot. Currently, the plant has a robotic system in place for painting airplane panels.

Robinson argues that the change to robotics gives way to efficiency and increase in production without loss of manpower.

"We wouldn't do it if it weren't cost effective and more productive. It allows us to be more productive and more competitive. And when we become more competitive, we can get more contracts and we can hire more employees," she said.

The Boeing aircraft plant in Seattle employed roughly 400 people before automation. Today, 20 employees work in the plant, Strahan said.

Northcraft said he views the United States' technological changes as greed.

"It used to be companies were satisfied with a profit. In this day and age, we want windfall profits," he said. He said his union has little hope of altering moves for automation, specifically in the Kansas Legislature.

"As far as bills (legislation) telling companies how to run business, there is no bill in the world that will do that," he said. Some unions are taking a more active role in the process of influencing legislation and corporate policy.

"It is primarily in state and federal government that we are going to have to prevent the erosion of the working class," Strahan said. He said he believes current legislation is outdated.

"Generally speaking, our push is to give the working people a place to go. We're not opposed to it (automation). We want to assure the working people a decent job. We know we can't stop it," Strahan said he expects only a small percentage of the current workers will be retained in high-technology jobs.

"All the figures we see indicate new technology and automation will be 7 percent of new jobs. That other 93 percent will be going to service-type jobs," Strahan said. Service-type work includes fast-food and janitorial jobs, he said.

Northcraft echoed Strahan's concern.

"You sure aren't going to supply as many jobs as back in the 1960s and 1970s," he said.

"We haven't had a problem that way. Part of the union agreement with IAMAW would be to develop a retraining program with them," Robinson said. The agreement was made between the company and the union representatives, she said.

"I feel there will be a gradual change from less skilled to more skilled, particularly in the service area," Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, said. "We will have to educate the masses, so to speak."

Virgil Wallentine, head of the Department of Computer Science, said his discipline has a particular interest in aiding displaced workers who have been displaced as a result of computers.

"It seems to me as computer scientists, we have an obligation to create computer-system education to retrain these people," he said. Such systems would retrain workers through the use of computers.

Rathbone said he agrees that more people will move out of current blue-collar jobs and into positions requiring knowledge of computer usage.

"We're not displacing, rather than transforming. The work will be more challenging. And therefore, I say, more interesting."

'Terms' leads Oscar nominations

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — "Terms of Endearment" led the Oscar nominations Thursday with 11, followed by eight for "The Right Stuff," the space-conquest movie that has yet to take off at the box office.

A major surprise was the Swedish film "Fanny and Alexander," Ingmar Bergman's avowed swan song as a director, which got six nominations, an unusual number for a foreign film.

The 4,000 Academy of Motion Pictures Arts and Sciences voters snubbed Barbra Streisand, who won no mention for her multiple duties as star, director, co-writer and producer on "Yentl."

Best picture nominees were "Terms of Endearment," "The Right Stuff," "The Big Chill," "The Dresser," and "Tender Mercies."

Shirley MacLaine and Debra Winger both were nominated as best actress for "Terms," and Jack Nicholson and John Lithgow were named in the best supporting actor category for the same film.

Other contenders for best actress are Jane Alexander for "Testament," Meryl Streep for "Silkwood" and Julie Walters for "Educating Rita."

Four of the five best actor nominations went to British stars — including Albert Finney as the aging Shakespearean actor and Tom Courtenay as his devoted servant in "The Dresser." Also named were Michael Caine for "Educating Rita" and Tom Conti for his performance in "Reuben, Reuben." The only American on the list was Robert Duvall, the country singer in "Tender Mercies."

Five relative newcomers were cited for best supporting actress: Cher for her performance in "Silkwood"; Glenn Close for "The Big Chill"; Linda Hunt for "The Year of Living Dangerously"; Amy Irving for "Yentl" and Alfre Woodard for "Cross Creek."

The nominees for supporting actor, besides Nicholson and Lithgow, were Charles Durning in "To Be or Not to Be," Sam Shepard for "The Right Stuff" and Rip Torn for "Cross Creek."

Dodger arrested for loaded gun

LOS ANGELES — Los Angeles Dodgers outfielder Kenny Landreaux was arrested Thursday after a sheriff's deputy spotted a loaded gun inside a pouch on the seat of Landreaux's car, authorities said.

Landreaux, 29, was booked for investigation of carrying a concealed weapon, and was released about an hour later after being given a misdemeanor citation, Deputy Anthony Grace said. Landreaux is to appear in court March 23.

Short meeting for large subject

JUNCTION CITY — A public hearing on a proposed telephone rate increase may have set a record for brevity — or lack of interest — Wednesday night.

Lawyers for the Kansas Corporation Commission and the United Telephone Co. of Kansas showed up in Junction City along with KCC member Phillip Dick. But the hearing was adjourned within two minutes because no member of the general public appeared to voice concerns about the proposed $4.7 million rate increase or to ask questions.

The rate request by United Telephone, which serves 65,000 customers in 109 Kansas communities, would boost residential bills $2.51 per month, about 20 percent. The KCC staff has recommended that the increase be trimmed to $1.7 million.

Docking may follow father's footsteps in governor's race

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Lt. Gov. Tom Docking announced Thursday he has organized a campaign committee in order to accept campaign contributions, the most solid indication yet that the son of the late Gov. Robert B. Docking may seek the Democratic nomination for governor in 1986.

While no decision will be made for some time, Docking said in an interview, he is giving more and more serious consideration to seeking the governorship in two years, when his term as lieutenant governor ends and Gov. John Carlin is ineligible constitutionally to succeed himself.

Significantly, his announcement came just 24 hours before Democrats gather in Topeka for their annual Washington Day weekend of party activities.

Also significantly, Docking named John D. Montgomery as chairman of the Tom Docking for Kansas Committee and Patrick J. Regan as its treasurer.

Montgomery, Junction City newspaper editor, was state highway director under Robert Docking and is a longtime confidante of the Docking family. He also has been a major fund-raiser for Democratic candidates over the years.

Regan, a Wichita attorney who heads the law firm in which Docking practices, was Carlin's appointee as chairman of the Kansas Water Authority until he resigned that position last year.

"I've explained before, and I haven't made any secret of it, that I am exploring the available options in 1986," Docking said. "No final decision has been made on what we're going to do. But I am seriously considering a race for governor in 1986."

Docking, who is the grandson of the late Gov. George Docking, said people have discussed with him running for governor, attorney general and Congress but that a race for the governorship "is receiving more serious interest than anything else in 1986."

But, he said, he has not ruled out a race for attorney general in 1986, "by any means," and stressed that he is not announcing a candidacy for anything at this time.

"I'm making it known more seriously that I am considering a race for governor at this point," he said.

"I am creating the political entity which can be used. I have had offers of contributions, and I must have such a committee in place to receive them."

Docking filed with the secretary of state's office a form of the Kansas Public Disclosure Committee making his campaign committee official.

"I have been gratified over the last several months by the number of individuals who have expressed a desire to make a contribution toward my political future," he said in a prepared statement announcing formation of his campaign committee.

"In light of this interest, I wish to take the necessary steps to permit such individuals to contribute as they so desire."

Some have speculated that Docking's age — he is 29 now and would be 32 during a gubernatorial campaign in 1986 — might be a drawback. But he said in the interview he has found that his age "is not a serious concern" among those encouraging him to seek the governorship.

He also said he isn't being told he should move quickly in order to capitalize on the Docking name before the memory of his father and grandfather has a chance to fade into history.

"Many people have said they have been observing my performance in office and what role we've been able to play in the administration," Docking said. "I don't hear much about the name."

He agreed Attorney General Robert Stephan appears to be the frontrunner for the Republican nomination for governor in 1986, but said it is premature to assess Stephan's strength in a campaign for governor.

"Right now, he looks like he'd be strong," Docking said, "but it's pretty early. He hasn't made any announcement, and I assume that means he hasn't made his final decision."

Docking also indicated he expects no intraparty fight if he does seek the Democratic nomination.

The only other prominent Democrat believed to be seriously considering the governor's race in 1986 is 2nd District U.S. Rep. Jim Slattery.

"We talk about all of these things from time to time," Docking said. "We're friends and we shoot straight with each other. There is absolutely no problem there."

Docking said he still has no timetable for deciding whether to run for governor.

"Obviously, we're ready to take the step we're taking (creating the campaign committee)," he said. "I think having John Montgomery as the chairman should send a message to Democrats across the state of Kansas."

El Dorado oil refinery to be sold

By The Associated Press

EL DORADO — The Getty Oil Co. refinery in El Dorado will be sold, not closed, under terms of a merger agreement with Texaco Inc., Fifth District Rep. Robert Whittaker, who has been monitoring the merger, said Thursday.

Whittaker, who is in Washington, cited a Federal Trade Commission order to Texaco to divest itself of the El Dorado refinery and other properties as part of the $10.1 billion merger agreement with Getty.

Bob Hoxie, director of media programs for Texaco in New York, said Board Chairman John J. McKinley has sent a letter to Texaco workers noting that the FTC required the company to divest itself of some operations, including the Getty refinery.

"The company intends to sell these activities as ongoing businesses to minimize the effects of the divestments on the employees involved," the letter said.

Whittaker said the FTC order will be satisfied when the refinery is sold. The buyer could then close the refinery, Whittaker said, adding that that is unlikely.

"If someone buys the refinery, it doesn't make sense for the buyer to close it," Whittaker said.

Matrix class draws community interest

By JAY BAUMAN
Collegian Reporter

Eleven art majors offer their talents at no charge to the K-State and Manhattan community through their Matrix class.

Matrix, a graphic design workshop taught by Karol Winegardner, assistant professor of art, serves approximately 20 clients each semester, many of which are campus organizations.

"The clients come in and give us an assignment. They give us all the information that is pertinent to their (graphic design) problem and they also give us their cost limitations," Winegardner said.

"The Department of Speech has been our best client. It has come to us on some of the McCain (Auditorium) productions. We just completed designs for the spring production of 'The Good Woman of Setzuah.' This design will be used for posters, programs and possibly advertising," she said.

"We also have just completed a cover design for the National Individual Events Tournament (NIET) which will be on campus this spring. The speech department also wanted a T-shirt design for a fundraiser for the NIET," Winegardner said.

"A poster for the Purple Masque Theatre production of 'Flying' also was just completed, as was a poster for our own faculty art exhibition which is being shown in the Union," she said.

"We have also done a good deal of graphic work for All-University Open House. The College of Engineering has come to us for ideas and designs during this time," she said.

Off-campus organizations and businesses also have used the services of the class.

"We have done work for a local aging agency and designed a logo and letterhead for Walters Construction Co. Inc. of Manhattan. We are now working on two brochures for the Warnego Hospital," Winegardner said.

After a client gives the class an assignment, the students are free to volunteer. Nine projects are required from each student per semester.

"Not every student will work on every project, maybe four or five on each. I like to have at least this many different pieces for the client to choose from," she said.

Staff/Andy Nelson

Eight students volunteered to work on the NIET cover because it was the first client this semester.

"The beginning of this semester has been hectic because we have had many clients," she said.

Students have two to three weeks to work on each project.

"I hate to turn any client down. We want jobs, we want the work, so the students have plenty of choices," Winegardner said.

Before a client returns to get the designs, the class critiques its work.

When the client visits the class, he tells the class which design he would like to work with.

"Usually we have been very fortunate. The client usually finds one he can use," she said.

When the client chooses a certain design, it becomes a printed piece. This means that the students receive printed work they can put in their portfolios.

If a client has a budget that will permit the student to be paid for the work that was printed, it is encouraged.

"We have been fortunate in this aspect. It's usually not a large sum, nothing like a professional salary, but it is encouraging to the student," Winegardner said.

"Even if their work isn't selected to be printed, they usually carry their design to a very good finish so that it is a portfolio piece, which is very important to the students," she said.

"For the student whose work is chosen, a printed piece for their portfolio is very advantageous to have. It shows some experience and some background in reproduction techniques," she said.

Todd Meyers, senior in fine arts, submitted a design to Manhattan's Sunset Zoo last year which won the National Zoo and Aquarium Month poster contest.

"I received both experience and exposure from this project," Meyers said.

"I enjoy this class because of the experience with the clients and actual printed work for my portfolio. There is a semi-competitive atmosphere where we learn from each other and we gain new ideas on how to improve our designs," he said.

Winegardner said she believes there is some growing involved in Matrix.

"It is a maturing process. Matrix is not as always nailed down as some classes are, where the teacher gives the assignment and everybody works on it.

"We have meeting times in class, but students have to work on their own time also. If they are active and participate, they will be doing the majority of their work out of class. They have to figure out how to schedule their time," she said.

"There are certainly due dates, but they can be staggered. A student who is very active can get involved in quite a lineup of due dates. They have to watch that and not get in too deep so that they have trouble producing," Winegardner said.

The class is offered every semester and is open mainly to senior level art majors.

The class is not required, and the only way to get into the course is by turning in a portfolio to Winegardner who, with the help of another graphic design teacher, chooses who she feels shows the best work.

Board adopts policy on class duplication

Kansas Board of Regents institutions are no longer required to drop classes if they are duplicated by Washburn University in Topeka.

The regents recently adopted a new policy which judges on an individual basis each course offered in Shawnee County by a regent school.

Under the previous policy, if Washburn decided to offer a course being offered by K-State in Shawnee County, K-State automatically withdrew its course.

Under the new policy, the positive and negative aspects of each course will be considered to determine if the course should be continued.

Mary Rowland, assistant provost at Washburn, declined to comment on the changes.

Stan Koplik, regents' executive director, said the universities should be pleased.

"It's a question of having your own class evaluated on an individual basis, not just having an automatic withdrawal," he said.

LaVerne Lindsay, K-State assistant provost, said the policy is designed to get the three major universities to communicate with each other about the different course offerings in order to avoid duplication. She said she favors the new policy.

Regent Gene Caspar said Shawnee County is served by five universities: K-State, the University of Kansas, Emporia State University, Pittsburg State University and Wichita State University.

K-State currently offers 14 classes at Washburn, said Rita Shelly, temporary instructor in the Division of Continuing Education.

Caspar said the majority of classes offered by K-State are taught at Topeka West High School and are educational courses for teachers.

Three adult occupation courses are offered at the Area Vocational and Technical School in Topeka.

new industry to Kansas and working on economic development.

"I'm surprised Robin would bring down an amendment like this," said Rep. Ed Rolfs, R-Junction City. "It's a very, very poor amendment. We've talked a lot in the last couple years about economic development and the need to attract new businesses to the state. One way not to do that is by increasing taxes on industry."

However, several Democrats, including Minority Leader Marvin Barkis of Louisburg, Bill Reardon of Kansas City and John Solbach of Lawrence, argued that corporations have received large tax breaks from the federal government and the state should get some benefit from those savings.

Reardon said corporations in Kansas received $40 million in federal tax reductions last year and a $10 million tax increase imposed by the state would not hurt.

Isabel tells her friend Bertha Holloway, played by Katie Sinnett, senior in theater, of her dreams to become an Air Force pilot.

Sandy tries to win Isabel's love by serenading her and giving her flowers, as Bertha sits in Isabel's bare apartment following the repossession of her furniture.

'Flying': An emotional look at life's problems

Isabel McNaughton, played by Marty Lovegreen, senior in computer science, welcomes back Sandy Wheatley, played by Chris Wolfe, senior in psychology.

Maj. Herrick, played by C.J. Prusik, senior in theater, argues with his ex-wife.

Comedy, sharp lines, singing and tears — along with a few more emotions — were presented last night at the opening of "Flying," an original two-act play by Ramona Lucius, graduate in English. The comedy, which opened in the Purple Masque Theatre, is presented by the Playwright's Workshop of the Department of Speech.

The play will also be presented at 8 p.m. tonight and Saturday night.

'This has been described as a woman's play, but I think it can also be looked at as a new-age man's play, too.'

— Chris Wolfe

The production, which is directed by Norman "Doc" Fedder, professor of speech, is the story of the problems of a newly divorced woman and how she chooses to solve them.

Isabel McNaughton, played by Marty Lovegreen, senior in computer science, is the woman who is faced with the decision of how to handle life after her divorce. After several job rejections, she comes to the realization that she has been thrust out into the job market with a bachelor's degree in French that isn't doing her any good.

To solve her problem, McNaughton finds a complicated way of going being accepted to Officer's Training School (OTS) to become an Air Force pilot.

McNaughton's ex-husband, Maj. Herrick, who is played by C.J. Prusik, senior in theater, thinks her decision will ruin his career and make him the laughing stock of the service. He rants and raves and threatens her, but to no avail — she is a determined woman.

McNaughton's friend, Bertha Holloway, played by Katie Sinnett, junior in theater, is a female Air Force mechanic always ready with a wisecrack and a put-down for Herrick. She has her own idea of men, and their use of women.

The answer to the question of how McNaughton is going to be accepted into the Air Force as a single parent is Sandy Wheatley, portrayed by Chris Wolfe, senior in psychology. McNaughton met him at her divorce hearing, and he keeps pestering her to let him take her out. He calls often, but McNaughton will have none of him until she has no other choice.

The play has well-defined characters and plot. The story line in this well-directed and staged play is easy to follow — whether it is believable is left to the audience. Although there are some problems with acting, overall the good outweighs the...well, not as good.

The moral of this play is very clear. It brings up some interesting questions about relationships between sexes, and how well those relationships are defined.

"Flying" is performed in celebration of national Susan B. Anthony Week. A discussion of the women's issues deriving from the play will be held following the Saturday performance.

"I feel very good about it ("Flying")," Fedder said in an interview prior to the production. "It's been a lot of hard work, but I am very excited about it. There has been some rewriting done, and now we are proud of the results. Some of the rewriting was done as a result of the suggestions we received from the actors themselves."

Fedder, who directed the play, said it is a good experience for the playwright to see her production performed so she can become aware of what a production entails.

Sinnett, who plays the part of Holloway, said she thinks the part has a lot of potential. She said it's a difficult part to play, "because there are a lot of these type of women being portrayed right now."

"In order for the play to work, there has to be more to it than just the comedy, it has to have more depth. It would be very easy to let my character fall into a stereotype," Sinnett said.

"It's rather strange at times, I get a lot of flashbacks to my own service time through my character," said Prusik, who portrays Maj. Herrick. "It's kind of fun, playing a male chauvinist, because in my previous role I played a bigot. I am attempting to be a character actor."

He said he has no trouble seeing the character he plays as a real-life person. He said he has known some men in the service "who feel their wives should be either in the kitchen or the bedroom."

Lovegreen said she thinks the part of McNaughton is realistic because "it's almost a little to close to home for me." She said she is recently divorced and that there is a lot of similarity with the play and her personal life.

'It's been a lot of hard work, but I am very excited about it.'

— Norman Fedder

"Sometimes I think I'm a little too close for the part because it's harder than ever to get the differences out from McNaughton and myself. There are a lot of differences, but because of all the similarities I just can't totally be myself," Lovegreen said.

Wolfe, who plays Wheatley, said he enjoys the part because "It's a lot like me. It's the only non-military part in the play, and I have never been in the service, so I can relate to him," he said. "This has been described as a woman's play, but I think it can also be looked at as a new-age man's play, too. A liberated man who could take the role of a woman and raise children as a counterpart to women."

Pilobolus combines acrobatics, dance

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

Combining forms of acrobatics, gymnastics and mime into dance, Pilobolus Dance Theatre is scheduled to perform at 8 p.m. tonight in McCain Auditorium.

According to Charles Kramer, professor of biology, the word Pilobolus, the name of a fungus, comes from a Greek word meaning hat-thrower. The word was chosen for the group's name because this particular fungus develops a packet of spores on its long, fruiting structure that it can repel. Pressure builds up inside the fruiting structure, it ruptures and can shoot the packet of spores up to three or four feet.

Jonathan Wolken, former biology student at Dartmouth College, discovered the word and later founded the dance company Pilobolus along with classmate Moses Pendleton.

Pilobolus' dancers have been described as acrobats, abstract mimists and gymnasts. Initially, critics agreed that what the dancers were doing was interesting, but it took years of debate for them to concede that Pilobolus probably belonged within the genre of dance.

"Pilobolus Dance Theatre, I would have said a year ago, is simply ingenious. Now I'm not so sure that the gift of ingenuity isn't capable of once in a while surpassing itself, so that we are shaken out of admiration into awe," commented Arlene Croce in a dance review for New Yorker magazine.

The two things that separate Pilobolus Dance Theatre from other dance companies are its choreographic process and movement style.

Since Pilobolus' conception in 1971, the choreography has been created collectively by all members of the company. Improvisation, in the studio and out in the rain, has played a major part in the creative process of the company's dances.

"We were much more interested in making dances than in dancing or in thinking of ourselves as dancers — it was a mental trap, an idea. We would ask ourselves, 'If the curtain opened, what would you like to see?' Then we trained our bodies according to the choreography, rather than according to a dance technique," Pendleton said in an interview with Vogue magazine.

Another difference is the movement style of the company. The original four male members of the company lacked formal dance training, but had a strong athletic background. So the "dancers" were not restricted to traditional dance vocabulary, but instead used movement from all available sources; gymnastic, acrobatic and dance. Choreographically the results have been the company members' display of unbridled energy and amazing strength. (The two women who joined the company in 1973 decided to begin lifting weights).

The dances scheduled for McCain will give Manhattan an overview of the company's movement style as it has developed during the past 12 seasons.

"Ciona", choreographed in 1974, demonstrates the concern the company had for shapes and creating illusions for the audience. The figures used on the Pilobolus poster are from this dance.

"Untitled," a piece performed on PBS, illustrates when the company began to incorporate music into its dances and deal with the relationships between people. In an interview with Elvi Moore, Pendleton described it as more of a theater piece.

This dance, which contains some nudity, has stirred some controversy among McCain patrons.

"There have been people calling to register their feelings," said Doreen Bauman, director of McCain. "That's normal."

Bauman refused to comment on the number of callers who had complained about the scheduled nudity.

Another dance scheduled is "Mirage," choreographed in 1983, which will indicate the direction the company is now moving.

"We're using music more. Sometimes in the old Pilobolus, we were much more visually oriented — we approached choreography as if it were a painting or a sculpture. But we're in great need of the musical phrasing, the delicacy and balance you find in ballet. I think Pilobolus now has the potential to become a dance company," Pendleton said in the Vogue interview.

Pilobolus has expanded from four to 10 dancers and traveled far from its base in Washington, Conn.

K-State's Angie Bonner reaches for a loose ball as the University of Colorado's center Patty Slighter pressures her from behind. Bonner led the Lady 'Cats' inside play hands CU 94-67 loss

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

A 10-1 scoring burst with 3:45 remaining in the first half helped lift the K-State Lady 'Cats' basketball squad to a 94-67 victory over the University of Colorado Lady Buffs in Thursday night action at Ahearn Field House.

The win improves the 12th-ranked Lady 'Cats' to 17-5 overall and 7-2 in the Big Eight Conference. Colorado drops to 9-13 overall and 2-7 in conference play.

A hot-shooting Colorado squad in the first half played nothing like its Big Eight record indicated, canning 12 of 23 field goals for 52 percent and hitting an impressive nine of 11 free throws for a 81.8 percentage. K-State was equally impressive from the field, connecting on 18 of 30 shots for 60 percent, but had its share of difficulties from the free-throw line, making only eight of 14 attempts.

K-State took the early 4-0 lead, but later fell behind 18-12 as freshman forward Tiffany Hill took control of the Colorado offense, hitting 12 of the Lady Buffs first 18 points. Teammate Diane Hiemstra added the remaining six points.

The Lady 'Cats' came back to take a 25-24 lead, but once again fell behind as four straight points by CU's Nina Smith gave the visitors a slim 28-27 advantage. K-State held a 33-32 lead when the Lady 'Cats' exploded for their 10-1 scoring display.

Sophomore Jennifer Jones and junior Angie Bonner were the leading scorers for K-State in the first half, hitting 12 and 11 points, respectively. Hiemstra and Hill combined for 24 of the Lady Buffs first-half points as Colorado fell behind 44-33 at the half.

K-State switched from a man-to-man defense to a full-court zone in the second half of play to counter Colorado's scoring success, but ran into its own problems when it came to offense, failing to hit a field goal until the 16:16 mark.

Colorado came within seven points of the Lady 'Cats, but could get no closer as freshman starter Carlisa Thomas and sophomore Cindy Durham combined for 10 of K-State's next 12 points as the K-State women opened a 59-44 lead.

The strong inside play of the Lady 'Cats' in the next 10 minutes — all but two of the next 25 K-State points came from inside shots or free throws — helped the home squad increase its lead to 21 points with 2:36 remaining.

A full-court Colorado zone press proved to be unsuccessful as the Lady 'Cats' continued their offensive assault from the inside, breaking the Lady Buffs press for easy layups.

K-State took its largest lead of the contest, 94-65, before closing out the 94-67 win.

Bonner led the Lady 'Cats' with 20 points and seven rebounds. Thomas added 17 points and six rebounds in 23 minutes of play. Sophomore Tina Dixon scored 16 and Jennifer Jones canned 14 to round out the double-figure scoring for K-State. Sophomore Cassandra Jones added four assists and eight steals for the Lady 'Cats.

K-State committed a season-low 13 turnovers in the contest.

"It was a good team effort," K-State Head Coach Lynn Hickey said of the first of two consecutive home games this week. "Everyone was relaxed and I was pleased with our lack of turnovers."

Hartman guns for record victory

K-State Basketball Head Coach Jack Hartman may become the Wildcats' all-time winningest coach Saturday afternoon as the men's basketball team trades hoops with the Oklahoma State State University Cowboys. Tip-off time for the game is 2:05 p.m. at Ahearn Field House.

The Cowboys lost a narrow decision to the conference-leading University of Oklahoma Wednesday evening, 57-55. The loss — Oklahoma State's first at home this season — dropped the Cowboys to 4-4 in the Big Eight Conference and 12-10 overall.

Tom Alfaro scored 21 points as the Wildcats shot down the University of Colorado, 74-64, Wednesday. K-State's win, coupled with Iowa State University's 64-61 setback to the University of Missouri, moved the Wildcats into a tie for the conference basement with a 3-6 record. K-State's overall record evened out to 11-11.

Hartman will be trying to unseat Tex Winter as K-State's all-time winningest coach in the game against OSU — Hartman's alma mater. His K-State record is 262-137, and in his collegiate head coaching career of 22 seasons he is 405-201. Winters won or shared eight conference titles during the late 1950s and 1960s.

Oklahoma State won the meeting between the two squads in Stillwater earlier this season, 60-58. K-State overcame a 10-point deficit in the second half before four straight free throws in the final 39 seconds by guard Winfred Case sealed the victory.

U.S. receives gold dividends

By The Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Yugoslavia — Bill Johnson, hurtling down Mount Bjelasnica at an average speed of 63 mph, ended European domination of the men's downhill Thursday as he won America's first men's Alpine Olympic gold medal ever at the XIV Winter Games.

"Finally the string is broken," said the brash, confident Johnson, referring to the nine previous Olympic downhill, all won by European skiers, most of them Austrian. "We can win a lot more. I was glad to stick it to the Austrians. They think they should win every time.

"This is both America's medal and mine," he said, echoing the words of Debbie Armstrong who yelled to the crowd after her giant slalom victory, "Now America has it."

Johnson, 23, of Van Nuys, Calif., has virtually conquered downhill skiing in just over a month. On Jan. 15 in Wengen, Switzerland, he stunned Europe's best by becoming the first American ever to win a World Cup downhill race. Now he is also the first American ever to win an Olympic downhill gold.

The gold medals of Johnson and Armstrong in Alpine events gave the United States its best showing in the centerpiece Alpine events since it won two golds in 1952.

Johnson was clocked in 1 minute, 45.59 seconds. Switzerland's Peter Mueller claimed the silver medal in 1:45.86, and Austria's Anton Steiner took the bronze in 1:45.95. Franz Klammer of Austria, the 1976 Olympic downhill champion, took too much air on his run and finished 10th in 1:47.04.

From the start of downhill training 12 days ago, Johnson insisted the course was made for him. It contains few difficult turns and several long, flat sections, perfect for "gliders" — skiers who make good time on the flats. And Johnson, one of the best gliders in the world, predicted he would win after dominating training runs.

"I put a lot of pressure on myself" with the prediction, Johnson said Thursday as his victory became apparent. "If I had gotten second, I'd be a real bum. I would have gone into a manic-depression."

"But this is my course. I can go straight faster than anybody. I don't want to say I'm the best in the world, but I won the Olympics and I deserve the gold medal."

Scott Hamilton won the first Olympic men's figure skating gold medal for the United States in 24 years Thursday night, but the finale disappointed even the three-time world champion.

Canadian Brian Orser, who outskated Hamilton in both the freestyle and the short program, won the silver medal. Jozef Sabovtchik of Czechoslovakia won the bronze.

Had he not been first in compulsory figures — the first event leading to the medal — Hamilton might have lost the pot of gold America has wanted for so long.

Hamilton, 25, who skated with a right ear infection, did not complete two planned triple jumps — a flip and a salchow — but pulled off three others.

Track seasons over for injured Switzer

By JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

K-State's men's track team will be without the performances of Veryl Switzer for the remainder of the indoor track season and the entire outdoor season due to a knee injury.

Switzer underwent five hours of arthroscopic surgery on Wednesday to repair torn ligaments he sustained Saturday at the Illini Track Classic at the University of Illinois at Champaigne. At the meet, Switzer was completing his last jump in the long jump competition when he landed wrong — in full extension — putting much pressure on his left knee.

Head Track Coach Steve Miller said Switzer will wear a cast for six to eight weeks, and rehabilitation won't begin until June or July.

"Veryl will be declared a hardship ruling in the indoor season and red-shirted for the outdoor season," Miller said.

Despite Switzer's injury, he was able to finish second in the long jump competition in Illinois with a best leap of 24-feet-3.

Earlier this year he qualified for the NCAA indoor nationals with a jump of 25½ feet on Feb. 5 in a home meet against Wichita State University. This mark also set an Ahearn Field House record.

"It was a very unfortunate accident because Veryl is vital to our program," Miller said. "He competes not only in the long jump, but the sprints as well."

Last year Switzer finished second in the long jump at the indoor nationals and third in the 60-yard dash with a time of 6.23 at the Big Eight championships. In the outdoor season, he captured third in both the 100-meter dash and the long jump.

"It was a monumental loss and it might hurt us in the Big Eight title race, but the rest of the squad has been performing well," Miller said.

Both the men's and women's teams will make final preparations for the Big Eight Indoor Championships, scheduled for Feb. 24-25 in Lincoln, Neb., by hosting another home dual meet on Sunday. The 'Cats will challenge tracksters from Central Missouri State University with the meet starting at 2 p.m. in Ahearn Field House.

Originally, Iowa State University and the University of Nebraska had been listed among the teams for Sunday's meet, but only a few individuals are expected from these schools. These performances will not be figured into the team scoring, however.

"The purpose of this meet (against Central Missouri State) is to give us a chance to run a tune-up. Plus we wanted to run another home meet to bring the sport back on campus again," Miller said. "We've been real happy with the feedback we've been getting at our home meets."

Few men enter untraditional fields

Women still struggle for equal work

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sally Ride became the first American woman to fly in space. Sandra Day O'Connor donned the robes of a Supreme Court justice, and for the first time, talk of a female vice president of the United States gets serious attention in presidential campaign debates.

Yet, women now hold only eight of 75 active astronaut positions at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. They constitute 52 of 677 federal judges and 24 of 535 members of the House and Senate.

From 1972 to 1982, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, women expanded their ranks in such traditionally male-dominated occupations as medicine, law, management-administration and college teaching.

But most of the more than 40 million working women remained in traditional women's work, comprising the bulk of bank tellers, school teachers, nurses and librarians, and few men crossed over to jobs historically held by women.

"It takes an awful lot of movement (of women into traditionally male jobs) to show any change in trend," says Harvey Hamel of the bureau's Division of Employment and Unemployment Analysis.

Avril Madison, executive director of Wider Opportunities for Women, Inc., a private organization which provides job training consultation for some 140 independent women's groups in 35 states, said the latest figure "graphically illustrates that sex segregation and discrimination in education, training and employment are very much alive and well in the United States."

Madison said she is pleased that women have been able to move into such fields as medicine and law, but added that these advances were possible "only when the primary criterion for employment was a graduate professional degree."

Among the findings in the federal employment and earnings records:

— Women comprised 99.1 percent of the nation's approximately 4 million secretaries in 1982, compared with 99.2 percent a decade earlier. Among some 71,000 registered nurses, they held 95.6 percent of the jobs, down from 97.6 percent in 1972.

— Females made up 35.4 percent of college and university professors, up from 28 percent in 1972. But women held 98.5 percent of the pre-school and kindergarten jobs, and continued to occupy the vast majority of teaching positions in public education.

— The ranks of female miners expanded from 0.7 percent to 1.4 percent, while women held 6.7 percent of the police officer and detective jobs, compared to 2.6 percent in 1972.

— Women increased their ranks among doctors and dentists from 9.3 percent to 14.6 percent, and among lawyers and judges from 4 percent to 15.5 percent. In managerial and administrative positions, women moved from 17.6 percent to 28 percent.

The bureau revamped its list of occupations in 1983, providing a much more precise definition of the various job categories. Thus, 1982 was the most recent year for which comparisons could be made.

According to the latest government labor force statistics, in January women comprised 43.6 percent of the some 103 million Americans with jobs. In 1972, women held 38 percent of all jobs.

Thousands more women are preparing to move into the high-paying, high-prestige jobs of law and medicine.

In the 1982-83 school year, women held 19,627 of 66,886 medical school seats, representing 29.3 percent of enrollment, according to the American Medical Association. In the 1972-73 academic year, women constituted only 12.8 percent of the some 47,500 enrollees.

The American Bar Association said that of some 127,200 people enrolled in approximately 170 law schools last year, 47,980 were women. In 1979, the earliest year for which the ABA has such figures, women occupied 38,627 of some 123,000 seats in law schools.

Women's earnings continued to lag well behind those of the some 55 million working men, according to a recent Bureau of Labor Statistics report. Women who held full-time jobs in 1983 had average weekly earnings of $260, compared to $393 for men, according to the survey published last month. Even in occupations where the worker held a management position or practiced a particular specialty, that report said, men outdistanced women by $551 to $370.

Commissioner of Labor Statistics Janet L. Norwood, in an address last year to the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy of Tufts University, said: "Women today are probably much better off than their mothers, but they are not so well off as their brothers."

Even in a new industry, such as

Atlantic City's 5½-year-old gaming business, women generally get jobs traditionally considered female.

Jack E. Woods Jr., director of affirmative action and planning for the Casino Control Commission, said Wednesday that of the city's 30,958 casino hotel employees, 45 percent are women. But 66 percent of them are employed in the lowest-paying jobs — office, clerical and sales positions.

"No casino...has been able thus far to meet the goal requirements of 43 percent female and 20 percent minority representation in all levels of the job hierarchy," he said.

Jane Flipping, affirmative action officer and employee relations manager for the Claridge Hotel and Casino, defended the industry's hiring practices, saying that finding people qualified for certain high-level jobs often is difficult. "We're not only trying to put persons into positions, we're also trying to put in the best persons," said Flipping.

Such statistics underline the issue of "comparable worth" — the concept that a woman should be paid as much as a man for work requiring similar skills and education. Recently a federal judge ruled that the state of Washington violated the Civil Rights Act by permitting the development of a sex-segregated public employment work force with wide disparities in compensation for jobs of comparable value.

In other business, senators approved allocating $75 to Student Governing Association to for the purpose of sending letters to recipients of Putnam and KSU Foundation scholarships as a means of student recruitment.

"The Finance Committee supports this in view of declining enrollment and the fact that student recruitment was a major issue in the recent student body president campaign," Porteus said.

Senate also passed a resolution approving the new student body president, senators and members of the Board of Student Publications.

Bill exempts farmers from tax measure

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin signed into law today two bills, including one to relieve farmers of a requirement to file papers seeking a property tax exemption for their machinery.

The property tax bill, which takes effect in July with its publication in the statute book, eliminates a provision that forces owners of farm machinery to file an initial request with their county appraiser to remove property taxes from their equipment. The application has to be approved by the state Board of Tax Appeals.

Property taxes were lifted from farm machinery by a law passed in 1982.

In addition, the bill clarifies that school buildings or grounds are exempt from property taxes if leased to another group for a purpose that also is exempt from taxes.

Israelis raid rebels; Marines withdraw

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Israeli warplanes bombed and strafed rebel-held positions on the coast and in the Syrian-controlled central mountains Sunday, while radio reports said Lebanese troops fought off a three-pronged Druse attack at Souk el-Gharb.

The U.S. Marines were being transferred out of Beirut to ships off the coast, presidential adviser Robert McFarlane said in New York, and the Italian contingent of the Multinational Peacekeeping Force began moving its equipment to freighters in preparation for withdrawal of most of the 1,400 men starting today.

The Israeli command said its targets were "terrorist" positions. And in Jerusalem before the air raids were announced, Cabinet Secretary Dan Meridor warned Israel would not "let them (the Palestinians) build bases from within their (Druse) lines. I hope this message is clear to the Druse and others."

The raids followed an attack on an Israeli patrol earlier in the day in Sidon, south of the Israelis' Awali River frontline in southern Lebanon. The state radio said "a few" Israelis were wounded in the attack.

President Amin Gemayel's national security advisor, Wadih Haddad, was to meet with U.S. officials in Washington this week to discuss the future of the multinational force, according to the privately owned Central News Agency.

In Damascus, Syrian President Hafez Assad met with Amal leader Nabih Berri. Berri and Druse leader Walid Jumblatt also met twice with Syrian Foreign Minister Abdul-Halim Khaddam.

At Beirut airport, a spokesman for the American Marines said the major evacuation of Marines to ships offshore that President Reagan has ordered, was not yet under way, but in New York, national security adviser McFarlane said "They are moving already and I'm sure there are some aboard ship by this time." He spoke in an ABC-TV interview.

Italian forces loaded 260 military vehicles on freighters at Beirut's port in preparation for a Monday departure planned for most of the 1,400-man Italian contingent, an Italian spokesman said. A clean-up force of 100 will stay behind.

Lebanese rebel leader plans 3-day visit early next month

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Walid Jumblatt, the Druse leader who is fighting the Lebanese government of Amin Gemayel, will visit the United States early next month, the head of an American Druse organization said Sunday.

"Mr. Jumblatt has accepted an invitation to the United States from the American Druse community," said Raymond H. Hamden, chairman of the American Druse Public Affairs Committee.

Jumblatt is scheduled to arrive

March 7 for a three-day visit, but his plans have not been finalized, Hamden said.

Hamden said he hopes Jumblatt can meet with State Department and Pentagon officials, although no formal arrangements have been made.

Hamden said Jumblatt's visit is designed to correct misperceptions about the Druse, a religious sect whose creed is basically Moslem.

"We are not anti-Christian or anti-American," Hamden said. "We are against the Phalange government" led by Gemayel, a Maronite Christian.

Price reductions make computers available to households

By DAVID BEVENS
Staff Writer

High technology, specifically computers, is no longer just a part of industry or business. Computers are rapidly being moved into households and changing the way people live.

"It's that tremendous reduction in price that has made it (technology) available to the general society. And if you put a computer in someone's hands, they'll do something with it," Virgil Wallentine, head of the Department of Computer Science, said.

The computer that is placed in hands and homes is usually the microcomputer.

"The microcomputer has the potential to be a very useful tool. It's good at information storage, which could include menus, names and addresses," Robert Poresky, associate professor of family and child development, said. A person can purchase a computer package — computer, printer and other accessories — for $700 to $1,000, he said.

The Department of Family and Child Development is exploring ways to aid families using microcomputers.

"I think the thing that has motivated us is the way the computer can be a resource of the shared experience within the family. One of the aspects of the computer, one of its strengths, is the interaction process (of families)," Carroll "Ken" Kennedy, professor of family and child development, said.

Several people within the department have taken the book, "How Do I Say I Love You," written by Judson Swihart, instructor in family and child development, and adopted it to the microcomputer. Couples reading the program on the computer are given questions to answer about each other and themselves. The program is accompanied by occasional segments of a love song.

"The effect of going through that set of questions is that they will have had the experience of reading that book together. Not very many couples would take the time to read it together," he said.

'The real question will be the creativity of people involved in working with families.'

— Carroll Kennedy

One of the problems associated with creating family interaction computer programs is the distribution of such programs. A county home economist is located in every county in the United States primarily to aid families with problems or concerns. But not all offices are equipped with computers and programs for the family, he said.

"We envision that extension offices will have a lot of information on computers," Kennedy said. This is an area which needs development in the near future, he said.

"The real question will be with the creativity of people involved in working with families. The people who work with families need to be creative, and also the development of material to help the family needs to be creative," Kennedy said.

The use of microcomputers is turning from arcade games to more educational material. Neal Brecheisen, manager of Radio Shack, said.

"The parents and children that come in are leaning away from arcade games and toward the educational packages," he said.

Educational programs produced by Walt Disney and Children's Computer Workshop, a division of Sesame Street, teach young children mathematics and spelling, he said.

"Not only is it very entertaining, but also very educational. The hottest ones (programs) in demand at this store are the educational ones," Brecheisen said.

"To some extent it could be a financial problem, and to some extent it could be an attitude problem. Right now there is a wide variation among adults. Some are hostile, some are traumatized and some are ecstatic about computers," he said.

"It's that older generation who say, 'Gee, that's a great thing, but I don't have use for one,'" Brecheisen said. People often come into the store leery of computers, and within 10 to 15 minutes they are writing short computer programs, he said.

'I think the thing that has motivated us is the way the computer can be a resource of the shared experience within the family.'

— Carroll Kennedy

"I think the best way (to become acquainted with the microcomputer) is to say to yourself, 'Well, it's not going to hurt me,'" David Blankinship, temporary instructor of student development, said. Children are becoming increasingly involved with microcomputers, he said.

Micro 80 magazine has devoted several issues to children who have written computer programs.

"The reality is probably getting kids involved," Blankinship said.

Once, children took apart their toys to see how they worked. Now they take apart computers to see how they work, he said. Blankinship said he views high technology and computers as the tools that will break down intellectual barriers.

"If anything, microcomputers can become the great equalizer," he said. Lower prices will make it available to a large part of society in the future, he said.

Some people worry that those who can afford a microcomputer will have an advantage over those who can't afford one.

"This is a problem that needs to be recognized and considered," Kennedy said. However, Kennedy said he believes that the problem is more in adaptation to microcomputers than the price of them.

The reduction in price and users' manuals have aided people in working with microcomputers.

Users' manuals tend to be put on the "back burner," Brecheisen said. Computer tutorial users' manuals are becoming popular for adults and older children, he said.

Microcomputer users are not only using the manuals to write software, but they are also experimenting with them in other ways, such as robotics.

"Out of the bunnies we sold (mechanical robotic toys), we found that the home hobbyists are coming in and trying to figure out how to connect it with a home computer," Brecheisen said.

And tomorrow?
"New technology will mean that families will spend much more time together. While robots vacuum floors, mow the lawn and do laundry, family members will use computers to pursue their careers, get their educations, shop for clothes and have medical checkups — without ever leaving home," according to the 50-year anniversary issue of U.S. News and World Report magazine.

Sen. Solarz to speak at McCain

Sen. Stephen J. Solarz, D-N.Y., will speak at 10:30 a.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

The lecture, titled "A Look at the State of the Union," is sponsored by the KSU Convocation Committee.

Solarz also will hold a question-and-answer session, which is open to the public, at 1 p.m. in the Union Little Theater.

He was scheduled to present a University convocation last November, but transportation problems forced him to cancel his appearance.

Rays' employees purchase bars

An empire built on cold beer changed hands Friday afternoon.

Terry and Jan Ray, owners of five Aggieville bars, sold the establishments to employees of Ray Enterprises. Terry Ray refused to disclose a sale price.

Mike and Christy Kuhn purchased Kite's, 619 N. 12th St., and Mr. K's, 710 N. Manhattan Ave. Mike Kuhn, a former K-State football standout, had been employed by the Rays for 15 years, most recently serving as comptroller for their firm.

Mike and Julie Larimore purchased Aggie Station, 1115 Moro St., and the Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon, 1215 Moro St. Mike Larimore had served as operations manager for the corporation and had been with the firm for seven years. Steve McKenzie, who also had worked for the firm for seven years, most recently as manager of the Rockin' K Bar, 712 N. Manhattan, purchased the bar he managed.

"We signed the contracts at 4 p.m. Friday, and we're in the process of changing over to new ownership on all five (establishments)," Ray said. "We don't foresee any basic management changes."

Ray, who said he plans to remain in Manhattan and pursue other investment opportunities, purchased the bars 15 years ago. He said he plans to retain ownership of the buildings in which the bars are located.

"We do plan on keeping our office here in Aggieville," Ray said. "Old habits die hard, and I have an awful soft spot in my heart for the entire Aggieville area."

Ray denied rumors that he plans to enter the political arena, but added that he will assist campaign efforts of Rep. Ivan Sand, R-Riley, and Attorney General Bob Stephan.

A proposed increase in the legal drinking age had nothing to do with the decision to sell the bars.

"We started working on this last August," Ray said. "We've dealt with the drinking age for many years. A raise in the drinking age is not going to put Aggieville out of business, and I think everyone realizes that."

Democrats prepare to grill Meese carefully

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Democrats plan to grill White House Counselor Edwin Meese III about allegations of political cronyism, his personal finances and his stand on civil liberties when he testifies before Congress on his nomination as attorney general.

Although Meese's strict law-and-order stance may ultimately propel the confirmation of President Reagan's aide through the Republican-run Senate, Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, charges that Meese's record is "an example of government by political cronyism" and plans to pick a fight.

Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have parceled out areas of Meese's background for investigation in preparation for the March 1-2 hearings. Metzenbaum has had his staff looking into Meese's finances ever since he was appointed by President Reagan Jan. 23 to replace William French Smith.

Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., for example, are planning to focus on Meese's civil rights record.

Metzenbaum plans to query Meese about $483,000 in personal loans and the appointment to government positions of people connected to some of the loans, said Roy Meyers, aide to Metzenbaum.

"We are not charging illegalities, but we are interested in questioning him on the circumstances," Meyers said.

A spokesman for Meese said he would not comment on the matters until after the confirmation hearings.

In particular, Meyers said, the Ohio senator intends to look into whether Meese has repaid two loans totalling $60,000 that had been arranged for Meese by his tax adviser, John R. McKean.

The General Accounting Office, Congress' investigative arm, had investigated the loans to determine whether there was any connection between them and the appointment shortly thereafter of McKean to a $10,000 post on the U.S. Postal Service Board of Governors. Both men denied such a link.

The GAO suspended its inquiry last year, having found that there was "no wrongdoing" and after receiving assurances that Meese was in the process of securing a commercial mortgage on his McLean, Va., home to repay the loans arranged by McKean.

UPC adviser Burke to resign

Barbara Burke, program adviser for the Union Program Council, has announced she will resign from her position in June.

Burke said she will be looking for a job on the East Coast.

"I'm not being ousted because people want me to leave or because of the failing concerts," Burke said. "It's time to go somewhere else. I'm wearing out my welcome here. I'm leaving for my professional and personal development."

said he apparently misunderstood the reporter's question, and actually he meant to say that he is strongly in favor of the drinking age being raised to 21.

Board disapproves bill to set entry requirements

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

A bill being considered by the Kansas Legislature which would set entrance requirements to Board of Regents schools for state high school graduates met with disapproval at the regents' meeting Friday.

The bill, which was introduced by Rep. Denise Apt, R-Iola, would require completion of a minimum four units of English, three units of math and three units of social sciences for admission to a regent institution. Apt also proposed to require an additional two units of a foreign language effective in 1990. The bill would affect the 1989 high school graduates.

Stanley Koplik, regents' executive officer, said the bill would alter the open admissions policy of the state.

"The system would still be open, but only to students completing required college preparatory classes," he said. "Our research shows only 7 percent of freshmen at regent schools have completed these requirements. Given these numbers, we should set goals like 50 percent (freshman having completed these requirements) by 1990."

Not all Kansas high schools offer the courses required by the bill, Koplik said.

"About 110 high schools, about one-third of (all secondary schools in) the state, are not equipped to offer all of these classes in their curriculum," he said. "I think we (the regents) need to consider the schools which are not able to offer these classes. I am concerned that we will not be treating everyone equally."

Regent Norman Brandeberry said the regents should work with the schools which can offer the suggested courses.

"We have about 220 schools that do offer these classes," he said. "These are schools in urban areas and probably 90 percent of the students in the state go to these schools, but we still only have 7 percent taking the classes. We need to improve these schools."

Academic advising also was considered at the regents' meeting. K-State President Duane Acker spoke to the Council of Presidents on academic advising procedures. The availability of more information on students would improve advising, he said.

"I think it would be worthwhile to review available sources of information — ACT scores, SAT scores and student transcripts — and work out a system to ensure all information is available to advisers," he said.

The information would not be used in determining admission, Acker said.

"We shouldn't judge students before they come in, but advisers should have adequate information to help students," he said. "Open admission policies are not the issue, but adequate advising."

The council voted to return the matter to the regents' Academic Affairs Committee for study on available student information and the best use of that information.

Regent schools may end open admissions rule

By SUZANNE LARKIN
Staff Writer

The open access policy of admissions in Kansas Board of Regents universities could change in 1988 as a result of a bill presented to the House that would require freshmen at any of the six regent universities to have completed specific college preparatory courses while in high school.

If passed, the proposal by Rep. Denise Apt, R-Iola, will take effect in July of 1988. Members of the graduating class of 1988 would still be admitted to a state university regardless of the classes they took while in high school.

The proposed bill would change the state's open access policy which allows any graduate of a Kansas high school to enroll at any regent school.

"I have introduced this bill because students need to be more aware. They need to be better prepared before they go to college, and high school is the time to prepare," Apt said.

The House Education Committee will continue to hold hearings on the bill and is expected to forward it to the floor before March 2, the last day to consider bills in the House.

Apt's proposal would require incoming college students to have completed four units of English, three of math, three of science and three of the social sciences. Apt said she plans to propose an additional requirement of two units of a foreign language to become effective in 1990.

These new requirements would result in reduced expenses, Apt said.

"Approximately half of the freshman class either drops out, flunks out or transfers to a junior college after their first year and, although this is not out of the national average, it is a real expense to the state and students' parents. My proposal would eliminate a great expense while tightening up academics in Kansas," she said.

Kansas has its own philosophy on education, one which could cause some problems with the passage of her bill, Apt said.

"The philosophy in Kansas is to have no restrictions on entrance to any of the regent schools. It has always been open access, and many people will want it to stay that way," she said.

At K-State and in Kansas, a student should be given the chance to fail, said Richard Elkins, director of admissions.

"I applaud anything that will improve education, but making restrictions such as the ones mentioned would hinder some students who may not have taken such courses in high school or students who really could achieve in college given the opportunity," Elkins said.

Although there are no requirements for Kansas high school graduates to be admitted to a regent university, Kansas is ranked second in literacy after Iowa, Apt said.

"Kansas people have always been concerned with education, and they have put their money where their mouth is," Apt said.

Administrators at Luckey High School, a Catholic school in Manhattan, currently are considering courses similar to those outlined in the bill for the school's college-bound students, said Dennis Meehan, Luckey High principal.

"Our Board of Education is looking into making such courses required for students who are preparing for college. We are considering this for next year, starting with the incoming freshmen. In addition to the courses suggested in the bill, we are considering the addition of two courses in a foreign language and one in computer science," he said.

Meehan said the individual student needs to be taken into consideration if such requirements are made.

"You have to look at the aptitude of each student. Each student is different and has different needs which should be met with a variety of courses. You have to interest the students who have no intention of going to college while preparing those who do," he said.

The ethics of the state are a contributing factor in the reason why Kansas has not set requirements on admissions before, Meehan said.

"Kansas has always believed in quality education and education for everyone. Now with the shift toward more industry in the state and the greater emphasis on technology, our students have to be more prepared," he said.

James Rezac, Manhattan High School principal, said there would not be much change in students' class schedules.

"The student who intends to go to college will take the two math courses and the three science courses, he may even take more to better prepare himself. If it is required, this same student will probably be taking the same classes, with the addition of a foreign language and maybe some computer courses," he said.

Rezac said he does not foresee any problems with the proposal, but non-college bound students should be considered.

"The proposal doesn't hurt the capable student, it places emphasis on him, but we do need to be concerned with the student who is not as strong academically. We need to raise the requirements for the college-bound student to better prepare them, but we also need to meet the needs of other students," he said.

Censorship of dance hinders art

Last week a few people spent a lot of time raising a ruckus about the nude dance performed Friday night in McCain Auditorium by Pilobolus Dance Theatre.

Art has been around since caveman paintings and rain dances. K-State's campus has sculpture, paintings and an art gallery in the Union. For the performing arts there are curricula in drama and dance.

Are those people who complained about nudity in the dance of a well-seasoned and highly praised professional troupe searching the campus making sure there are no nude paintings lining the walls of any offices? And what about paintings of nudes in museums and Michaelangelo's statue of David? These are established art forms. Is dance any less of an art form than painting or sculpture?

McCain did what it should to warn patrons of the nudity to appear on stage. The program order to be performed by the dance company was printed in every newspaper advertisement. Next to the dance "Untitled" a program note read, "One segment of this work is performed in the nude." The McCain staff noted this to allow people to choose not to attend the performance if they would be offended.

For many people, Pilobolus raised the question of where to draw the line between dance as an art form and dance as pornography. That is a personal question and the choice should be decided by the individual.

But some people believe the choice should not even be available and that dance companies that use nudity should not be sponsored on national and state touring programs.

This is censorship of the performing arts. The office of Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan said Kansas has never been in the business of censoring performing arts.

When viewing such a performance, a person should ask: Is the nudity necessary, or does it detract from the performance as a whole?

It is unfortunate that those who complained so loudly last week probably did not go to the performance to see what they were complaining about. The nudity appeared when two women on stage acted out the birth of their sons. When was the last time anyone saw a baby born with clothes on?

Pilobolus appeared Thursday night at the University of Kansas, performing the dance "Day Two," which contains partial nudity. The troupe performs "Day Two" and "Untitled" interchangeably. Jackie Davis, director of KU's concert and chamber music series, commented on the performance.

"They are a wonderful group. The performance was so organic and in no way a titillating experience," she said, referring to the nudity. The 2,000 people in attendance gave the company a standing ovation, she said.

Olympic athletes deserve praise

After a week that glittered but was barely gold for the United States, the 1984 Winter Olympic Games in Sarajevo, Yugoslavia, have come to an end.

While this Olympics did not produce victories reminiscent of American glory in 1980 at Lake Placid, several meritorious performances highlighted the games for the United States. America's winter athletes should be commended for a job well done.

Gold medals were won by Scott Hamilton in men's figure skating, Phil Mahre in the men's slalom, Bill Johnson in men's downhill skiing and Debbie Armstrong in women's downhill skiing.

Other American athletes performed commendably. Rosalynn Summers was edged away from the gold medal in women's figure skating by Katarina Witt of East Germany. Summers delivered a fine performance in the freestyle event, earning a perfect 6.0 score for artistic impression from the Italian judge. Two other Americans, Elaine Zayak and Tiffany Chin, also skated impressively.

Kitty and Peter Carruthers, a brother-sister team, became the first Americans to win a medal in Sarajevo when they won the silver in pairs figure skating after a surprising, excellent performance in the freestyle division.

Steve Mahre finished second to his brother, Phil, and won the silver medal in the men's slalom.

Numerous disappointments plagued American athletes, including defeats of the hockey team and the disqualifications of Tamara McKinney and Christin Cooper in the women's slalom for missed gates.

Nevertheless, America can be proud of its victories in Sarajevo. The 1984 Olympics may not have been as memorable as the 1980 games at Lake Placid, but they didn't fail to provide the usual thrill of Olympic competition. And they continued the Olympic tradition of peaceful competition between countries, regardless of international strife and discord.

Giving blood could save a life

One hour is a unit of time most of us take for granted because of our various projects and activities.

What if you could give an hour of your time to save another person's life? Or save your own life?

What if an hour of your time could be used to save a victim of an automobile crash, a fall or complications from childbirth? Would you be willing to make this trade-off?

Would you be willing to trade an hour of your time to help find the cure for cancer, herpes, AIDS and a host of other diseases?

Sounds like a reasonable trade — one hour of your precious time to help others, and possibly yourself. Most of us probably would be willing to make such a trade.

What if I told you the hour I want you to trade will be spent in getting a partial check-up for FREE? You will have your temperature and blood pressure checked for FREE. You will have a partial review of your medical history with a nurse for FREE. You will even find out, FREE of charge, if you have enough iron in your body.

Does this sound reasonable? Let's add the benefit of spending most of the one hour on your back, reclining in a large webbed chair. You can converse with others. Who knows, you might even see some of your friends at this social/health gathering.

Let's add one more benefit — FREE FOOD. How about orange juice as a start? And, during the last 15 minutes of this hour, you will get a doughnut and a cup of tea, coffee or orange juice.

As a final FREE bonus, you will receive a card which will list your name, address, identification number, sex, birthdate and blood type.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

Ready to sign up? Good. Go to the Union today and sign up to give blood at the Bloodmobile, which will be on campus Tuesday through Friday.

All of the above are included when you give blood. It's a safe, relatively painless procedure which takes about an hour of your time.

Here are some questions I have been asked in the past about giving blood. The answers are my opinion, so take them as you will.

Is it really relatively painless? I have given blood 12 times during the past six years. The most pain I have experienced during those visits is having the tape, which holds the needle in place, take some hair off my arm when removed.

Being stuck with the hypodermic needle doesn't hurt. Really. It feels as though someone has pinched you. The Red Cross uses sharp needles. Trust me.

What about the sight of blood? Well, the only time I see it is when it is running into the collection bag. I find it fascinating that blood flows so freely and that it really isn't as bright red as I once thought.

Do I have to watch the nurse insert the needle? Do I have to watch anything at all? Actually, you don't have to look when the needle is inserted into your arm or watch your blood fill the bag. I watch because I want to.

I watch the nurse insert the needle into my arm so I won't flinch. Weird, yes, but I find it works for me.

What if I faint? Let me say this: don't be embarrassed. When you give blood, about a pint of blood is taken. This loss may affect some people differently than others. The fact you are in a different environment may play a factor.

At least one doctor is at the Bloodmobile. In addition, there are at least a dozen qualified health professionals at the site. If you are going to faint, you'll be at the right place to do so.

I like to tease the workers who walk with donors from the collection area to the canteen area, because I am usually larger than they are. I always ask, "What would you do if I told you I felt like fainting?" The best response came from a nurse in my hometown. She told me, jokingly, "I'd keep your head from bouncing on the floor." I believed her.

K-State is traditionally the largest donation site in the Wichita Regional Red Cross area. Last semester, K-Staters — including students, faculty and staff — donated a record 1,747 units of blood.

Blood is needed for research and emergency medical use. Hospitals always need to have a ready supply of blood. The Red Cross supplies blood to hospitals, but it needs donations to maintain its inventory.

If you are in good health and are able to donate blood, sign up. It's a way to help someone you don't know, or maybe someone you do.

One hour of your life can make a difference.

Arrogance prevents U.S. learning

WASHINGTON — In the 1960s and 1970s, America poured billions of dollars and 50,000 lives into Vietnam. We organized the South Vietnamese army, trained it and ferried it into battle. When we pulled out our troops, South Vietnam collapsed.

In 1982 and 1983, America sent military advisers to El Salvador. They trained the army, taught it how to fight and when to fight and then, after the suitable graduation parades, certified it fit for battle. In late 1983, guerrillas took a garrison and a bridge defended by the newly reorganized army.

At the same time, America moved into Lebanon. It armed and trained the Lebanese army and pronounced it the centerpiece of the new shaky government. "We have done a fine job of training and equipping the Lebanese army," President Reagan said Dec. 15. "It is a good and well-trained force." In the last six months, the president has pronounced the Lebanese army "fine," "well-trained," "effective," "capable," "rebuilt" — everything but what it was when it came to the showdown in West Beirut, which was nowhere in sight.

Historians looking back at this period would have to conclude that America was the national personification of the old Bourbon kings: it learned nothing and forgot nothing. From Vietnam through Central America to Lebanon, it seized upon civil wars, declared them East-West battlegrounds and rushed in men and material. It ignored ethnic, religious or class differences and thought that new uniforms, helicopters and the American way of war would make the difference.

Cultural anthropologists could ac-

RICHARD COHEN
Columnist

cuse the United States of being ethnocentric — of seeing foreign places and peoples as exotic versions of America and Americans. Thus in Lebanon, an army that virtually did not exist last year was this year supposed to make the difference. And thus in Lebanon, people whose primary allegiance was either to their religious or ethnic groups were, in the course of the year, supposed to shed that heritage and proclaim their first loyalty to something called the nation.

The rubble that once was Beirut is proof that this did not happen. Several hundreds of years of ethnic and sectarian strife could not be overcome in a year. Even the Israelis, whose knowledge of Lebanon is unparalleled, have been humbled by their occupation of that country. When they invaded in June 1982, they did not just cross a national border, but one between the First World and the Third World. They were trapped by their own mentality.

Only an optimist would conclude that Lebanon will be a lesson for us. Every indication is otherwise. The situation there has not slowed the U.S. military buildup in Central America nor dampened the official enthusiasm with which the Kissinger Commission report was received. Once again, we are prepared to tackle age-old social and cultural problems with military and economic assistance. We will show the Salvadorans or the Hondurans how to fight and, if need be, do some of the fighting ourselves.

But, as in Vietnam or Lebanon, people will not fight for a cause that makes no sense to them. Lebanon may very well be important to America's Mideast policies, but that means nothing to a member of a Moslem militia or the Christian Phalange. What he wants is more parochial: security for his family and a say in the way he is governed.

The same holds for Central America. The soldiers of El Salvador refuse to fight at night or in small units not because the strategy has not occurred to them, but because it's dangerous. They are unwilling to risk their lives for a government which traditionally has been controlled by the ruling class and which has done nothing for them — nothing, that is, but draft them into the army. The only hope for the government is that most of the peasants hold the same view of the guerrillas. Mostly, they simply want to be left alone.

So again we are pulling American soldiers out of a country that has collapsed around us. Retreats, not reappraisals, have become our forte, and we die not once, like the brave, nor more than once, like a coward, but over and over again like the fool. Our real enemy is our arrogance.

On to El Salvador.

Senator urges improvement of state educational system

By LUCY REILLY
Collegian Reporter

A desire to upgrade the state educational system is the catalyst for a proposal by Sen. Billy McCray, D-Wichita, calling for raising the age for compulsory high school attendance in Kansas from 16 to 18.

McCray spoke here Friday to high school journalism students competing in the newswriting division at the Kansas Scholastic Press Association regional contest.

If the bill is passed, Kansas students would be required to attend high school until they are 18 years old or until they graduate.

McCray said U.S. Secretary of Education Terrell Bell thinks the education system needs more requirements for completion of high school.

Additional requirements for graduation recently have prompted some students to drop out of high school upon reaching age 16. With the possible installation of the bill, McCray said he hopes to keep students in school longer.

Currently, the drop-out rate for secondary education is 18 to 25 percent, McCray said. Many people drop out in their sophomore or junior year of high school because of personal or family problems. Society doesn't expect the adolescent to go back to school, McCray said.

"This (the bill) is a bulwark for the parents. It gives them some backing in trying to get kids back to school," he said.

The primary purpose of the bill is to provide young people who have difficulties in school with more time and help, McCray said.

"If a person lacks talent and skills, he might become a liability to society and end up on welfare or in jail," McCray said.

Throughout the nation, 14 states have passed a bill requiring mandatory high school attendance until age 18 or graduation.

"I can't say that this is necessarily working well," McCray said, "but I can say that states which have this law have had no problems with it."

As for the likelihood of the bill becoming law, McCray said he carries a hopeful, but realistic, attitude.

"I don't foresee it (the bill) passing, at least not this year," he said. "It would take at least two years to get through the Kansas Legislature. We hope to make it through one house this session, though."

In order to upgrade the educational system, another bill has been introduced by Sen. Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, McCray said. Kerr has devised a two-part plan advocating year-round attendance or an additional class hour every day.

ROTC junior cadet earns visit to Washington

A K-State Air Force ROTC cadet has been selected to attend the National Reserve Officer's Association Convention in Washington, D.C., this week.

Karen Pullen, junior in political science, was notified last week that she was selected to attend the convention. Her sponsor is the Kansas chapter of the Reserve Officer's Association.

"We received a letter from the Kansas chapter asking us to name a junior cadet from K-State to attend the convention," Capt. Steven Stambaugh, assistant professor of aerospace studies, said. "The other criteria included high academic standing. As the junior instructor, I compiled a list of my top 10 people based on grades, performance and initiative. Then I rank-ordered my list and sent it around to the other staff members in the Department of Military Science."

The Kansas chapter sponsors one Air Force cadet from K-State and one Army cadet from the University of Kansas each year. The convention, to be held in Washington, D.C., will include tours for the cadets to the Smithsonian Institution, Tomb of the Unknown Soldier and the Capitol. They also will hear a speech by Sen. John Warner of Virginia.

"Attending a convention like this is an opportunity to meet people in the Air Force. A lot of cadets are uncomfortable with (active duty) officers," Pullen said. "As a result of attending this sort of function and my involvement in Arnold Air Society, I have little difficulty meeting and talking with Air Force officers."

Pullen is the commander of the K-State detachment Arnold Air Society, the Air Force ROTC honorary.

"This also gives us an opportunity to meet cadets from the other branches: Army, Navy and Marines. That way we can learn how we all work together," Pullen said.

Pullen began her military career early. Her father retired from the Army and she classifies herself as an "Army brat."

"I never really thought of doing anything else," Pullen said of pursuing a military career. "The Air Force offers every career field. Initially I applied to the academies and was accepted at the Air Force Academy. I wasn't really happy there, it was such a structured environment, so I quit," Pullen said. "When I came to K-State, I talked with Lt. Col. (Thomas) Fryer (professor and head of the Department of Aerospace Studies) about ROTC. He was very supportive. I can see why many think the academies are the way to go to earn a commission, but you can learn just as much here as there."

The National Reserve Officer's Association is a special interest group which lobbies in Congress for the interests of reserve officers of all branches of the armed forces.

Fear of flying stops singer's tour

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Singer Aretha Franklin developed a sudden, paralyzing fear of airplane travel, forcing her to cancel two concerts in Kansas City and reschedule her entire February-March tour, her tour director said.

"I've talked to her doctor, her psychiatrist, and I know it's genuine," John Sdoucos said Saturday. "Every now and then this happens — someone who flies thousands of miles every year suddenly can't face getting on an airplane."

"After the first show was canceled, Aretha spent the whole week trying to get herself ready to fly to Kansas City, and then Friday morning she realized she just couldn't do it," he said.

The popular soul singer, who had hits with "Respect," "A Natural Woman," "Spanish Harlem" and many other songs, was stricken with a flying phobia just before she was to have given two shows in Kansas City last weekend, said Sdoucos, contacted at his home in Boston. Those shows were canceled and rescheduled for Saturday night. On Friday, the Saturday shows were canceled.

He said Franklin's performance dates would be rescheduled as soon as her doctors said she was ready to face touring, which requires flights almost daily.

Arrested reporter just after story

McALLEN, Texas — A Dallas Times Herald reporter who was arrested along with three Salvadorans, a nun and a social worker and charged with transporting illegal aliens was working on an article, officials of the newspaper said.

The arrests Friday in a predawn traffic stop on a rural highway in south Texas were among the first involving members of church groups that had announced publicly last year their intention to aid people fleeing El Salvador, the Times Herald said.

James L. Selbe, sector chief of the Border Patrol in McAllen, said three Salvadoran nationals were among the six people in a car that two agents stopped shortly after 5 a.m. Friday on Farm Road 649, about 20 miles south of Hebbronville in Jim Hogg County.

Reporter Jack Fischer, Sister Dianne M. Muhlenkamp, 36, of Donaldson, Ind., and Catholic lay worker Stacy Lynn Merkt, 29, of Colorado Springs, Colo., were arraigned before U.S. Magistrate Sue Williams in McAllen. They were freed on $10,000 personal recognizance bonds.

Larry Tarleton, managing editor of the newspaper, said in a statement released Friday in Dallas that Fischer "was working as a reporter on assignment for the Dallas Times Herald and was in pursuit of legitimate journalistic activities as an observer when he was arrested."

Selbe said the three were charged with transportation of illegal aliens and conspiracy to transport illegal aliens "based on information the Salvadorans gave during our interviews with them."

Reardon to run for Congress

TOPEKA — Mayor Jack Reardon of Kansas City, Kan., said this weekend he will run for the 3rd District congressional seat that will be vacated this year when Republican Larry Winn retires.

"I'm going for it," said Reardon, a Democrat, in an interview during the Kansas Democrats' Washington Day festivities here. "My polls have been excellent," Reardon said. "My name identification is 95 percent in Johnson County, second only to John Carlin."

Reardon said he plans to formally announce his candidacy next month.

Iowa poll reveals Mondale as favorite

By The Associated Press

DES MOINES, Iowa — Walter F. Mondale's prospects for a strong showing in the Iowa precinct caucuses were heightened Sunday by a state poll showing he is far ahead of his Democratic presidential rivals, but Sen. John Glenn said, "I'm still out to win this thing."

However, the latest Iowa poll said Glenn's support has slipped and the battle for second place was a virtual tie among Glenn, Sen. Alan Cranston of California and Sen. Gary Hart of Colorado.

In an appearance on the CBS program "Face the Nation," Glenn said, "The polls go up and down. They're very volatile and the polls have shown all the way through there are a lot of people still undecided."

Don Foley, a spokesman for the Mondale campaign, also was reluctant to give too much weight to the survey published in the Des Moines Register.

"The poll is obviously encouraging," said Foley, adding that "the campaign is not in a position to let down its guard."

The poll said that among Democrats who plan to attend today's precinct caucuses, 44 percent support Mondale. Conducted by telephone Feb. 12-16, the survey also found 17 percent backing Cranston, 14 percent Hart, and 11 percent Glenn.

Former Sen. George McGovern was at 7 percent and the Rev. Jesse Jackson at 4.

But of the Democrats interviewed only 66 said they would attend the caucuses, so the findings had a potential sampling error of plus or minus 12 points.

About 15 percent of all Iowa Democrats said they will attend the caucuses, or perhaps 90,000. Predictions of today's turnout range from 90,000 to 125,000.

A month ago, the Iowa poll of people who said they would attend the caucuses gave Mondale 35 percent, Glenn 14, McGovern 11, Hart, Cranston and Jackson 9 each.

While the Democrats were winding up their caucus campaigning, Iowa Republicans were preparing for a visit today by President Reagan, who had stops scheduled in Waterloo and Des Moines.

Reagan has no competition for the support of people who attend GOP precinct caucuses.

"In Iowa there's been a non-stop barrage of Democrats running around the state beating up on the president, trying to make people there believe he is unpopular," said John Buckley, a spokesman for the re-election committee. "This trip will dispel that."

Jackson also appeared on "Face the Nation," and criticized the Democratic Party leadership as "timid and cowardly, following opinion polls."

He ducked a question of whether he was referring to Mondale.

Hart, interviewed on NBC's "Meet the Press," said his recent sharp criticism of Mondale was an attempt to respond "to the question of how are you different from former Vice President Mondale."

Meanwhile, former Gov. Reubin Askew of Florida, defended his conservative positions at a rally in Johnston.

Tennessee police pursue 4 escaped prisoners

By The Associated Press

BROWNSVILLE, Tenn. — One convict was recaptured beside a highway Sunday as police hunted four others who executed a "well-planned" escape from prison using pistols that apparently had been planted for them in a prison field.

Officers searched through woods Sunday afternoon looking for two more of the inmates who escaped from Fort Pillow State Prison on Saturday.

The five, all considered "armed and extremely dangerous" were serving terms ranging from 25 years to 198 years.

They were on a work detail at the west Tennessee prison farm when they used the guns to overpower guards Saturday morning, forced one guard to undress and stole his uniform, officials said.

They allegedly took a family hostage as they made their getaway from the prison, and one inmate later shot out two windows in a vehicle driven by a prison official who was trying to stop the escape.

Sunday morning, three of the escapees were believed to have held a Haywood County man at his home until he agreed to hand over the keys to his pickup truck, authorities said.

No one was injured in any of the incidents.

While a state Highway Patrol helicopter searched from the air Sunday, about 70 officers using bloodhounds combed a 5-square-mile area just south of Brownsville, about 40 miles east of Fort Pillow.

"There is some thick underbrush," said Correction Department spokesman Dick Baumbach. "This could take awhile."

Convicted murderer and rapist Randolph Oliver, 33, of Memphis, was recaptured about 11:30 a.m. by Brownsville police as he stood along U.S. 70 near the search area. He was taken into custody without incident, Baumbach said.

Police believe the remaining two escapees fled the area in a car stolen from in front of a 24-hour convenience store in Brownsville early Sunday. They were believed seen driving a pickup truck at about 10 a.m. on Interstate 65 north of Nashville.

Other escapees were Sylvester Alexander, 33, Shelby County, 40 years for robbery with deadly weapon; Ronald Freeman, 41, Knox County, 198 years for two counts of murder; Riley Arzeneaux, 26, Shelby County, 25 years for second-degree murder; James Clegg, 30, Sullivan County, serving life for being a habitual criminal.

Dancers choreograph images of items, inhibitions, growth

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

If the performance by Pilobolus, the modern dance company that appeared Friday night in McCain Auditorium is any indication, tugging, pulling, spinning, twisting, ramming, stretching, coiling and supporting are basic functions of the human body.

Review

The company's first piece, "Ciona," which was choreographed in 1974, treated the audience to six bodies shaping visual images, something for which the company is known. Effective use of transitions between images created an overall flow throughout the piece. Hours spent working in front of a mirror, or a critical eye, molded images of a wave of water, mitosis of a cell and a slow-motion version of crack-the-whip. Three spinning dancers formed an interlocking axis and a merry-go-round in black light materialized and then faded into darkness.

A solo piece, "Moonblind," featured Carol Parker in a shiny floor-length slip in soft lighting. With hair held and twisted tightly above her head, Parker explored the boundaries of the stage like a bird trapped in a cage. She paused, and stepped outside of a material that encased her feet, loosened her hair and released her inhibitions. Like a woman finally alone in her dressing room, she stretched and turned in front of a mirror and marveled at her body's flexibility. Coy facial expressions conveyed that she was testing her own seductiveness. The play continued until a sudden fear of "being watched" overcame her. Parker pulled her feelings inside herself, stepped back inside the material that had enclosed her feet before and withdrew.

Comical relief came in the form of "Walklyndon," a 1971 piece that illustrated the Pilobolus style as it was conceived by the four original members. Men in slicker yellow unitards and colorful boxing shorts jogged, walked and staggered back and forth across the stage on a collision course. When two dancers met center stage, greetings ranged from handshakes to slap fights. One dancer leap-frogged his greeting over the oncoming pedestrian. The next dancer, trying to do the same, did not quite make it over, and both fell in a well-choreographed sprawl on the floor.

Pilobolus' amazing control and strength forced the audience to reflect on their personal abilities. It was particularly exhibited by a man transformed into a teeter-totter. Using his arms for a base the man's prone body lay as stiff as a board one foot above the ground. One dancer pushed on the "board's" head and another blew on its feet, causing the body to teeter back and forth. The audience reacted with laughter and awe at the wonderful display of muscle control.

The highlight of the night's performance came in the more theatrical piece, "Untitled," which appeared on the Public Broadcasting Service's Dance in America series.

The curtain opened on two women in Victorian dresses containing yards of material. With hair combed and straw hats in place, they promenaded the stage as if on a Sunday afternoon walk in the town square. The dance explored the maturation process of women from adolescence through widowhood. Images of playing tag, giving birth, rearing sons and posing for a family portrait described the intricate and complex relationships between a wife and husband and a mother and son. Shaking their skirts to the wind with the force of a gale, the women conveyed relief at reaching menopause.

Caring, supporting, clinging, leaning and being leaned on were feelings the women showed the men they loved. The dance closed as the lights faded on the two women, now elderly, being supported by man-made rocking chairs and memories.

"Untitled" and "Mirage," the two longer pieces in the program, illustrated that the company may be moving in the direction of dances incorporating more music, theater and social commentary. Since the company choreographs collectively, audiences can expect innovative and interesting changes each time personnel changes take place. A return performance to the Manhattan area would be welcome, indeed.

Hartman sets record as K-State whips OSU

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

Coach Jack Hartman called it "pretty."

Wildcat forward Lafayette Watkins said it was just a matter of getting loose.

Losing coach Paul Hansen said it was K-State's day.

"It" was a nearly flawless second-half performance by the 'Cats, shooting 66 percent from the field while putting the defensive clamps on Oklahoma State University. The result was a 72-56 K-State basketball victory over the Cowboys in a televised Big Eight Conference encounter Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

"I was proud of that second half, that was pretty," Hartman said. "We played awfully well, on both ends of the court."

The 'Cats, after a sluggish first-half showing, came out in the second half determined to break a six-game Cowboy winning streak, stretching over the last three seasons.

"In the second half, we really came out," Watkins said. "We weren't too loose in the first half, but they were tense, too. We just came out of it before they did."

Junior forward-turned-shooting guard Tom Alfaro again led the K-State charge. Scoring a team-high 19 points for the game, Alfaro opened the K-State barrage, canning a 22-foot jumper to push the 'Cats' 26-23 intermission lead to five. After junior center Eddie Elder connected on two free throws, Alfaro hit on two more 20-foot jumpers to up the 'Cats' margin to seven, 30-23.

The Cowboys, led by their forward tandem of Raymond Crenshaw and Joe Atkinson, stayed in the game until a back-breaking, four-minute stretch that saw the 'Cats score 11 unanswered points.

With the 'Cats holding a 40-33 advantage, Watkins started the scoring parade by banking in a jumper. After Alfaro popped in another long jumper, the 'Cats retained possession as Elder drew a foul from OSU's Charles Williams. Watkins took advantage of the opportunity, hitting a jumper to increase the 'Cats' edge to 46-33.

Elder then added two charity tosses and sophomore guard Jim Roder completed the run, turning in a three-point play after a twisting drive in the lane. With 9:43 left, the 'Cats were up by 18, 51-33, and Hartman's record-breaking 263rd career win as a coach at K-State was in the bag. Tex Winter held the old record of 262 victories.

"We were never in the game," OSU's Hansen said. "It was just one of those days when we needed a timeout every two minutes. Right from the start, when we turned it over our first three times down the floor, I could tell it wasn't our day, and we're a completely different team when we fall behind. Once they got their lead, there was no stopping them. It was K-State's day."

In the first half, although K-State appeared more loose than the Cowboys, they couldn't pull away. The 'Cats led throughout the game, but the biggest lead they could manage in the opening half was six before the Cowboys pulled within three at half.

"I thought we were a little excited in the first half," Hartman said. "We rushed our shots on our move to the bucket, and we didn't have any rhythm. In the second half we told them to put a move on them (Cowboy defenders) when they were open, and we came out running effectively."

The 'Cats were in such control of the game late that Hansen was ready to start the game over, Hartman said.

"Paul Hansen, who is one of my favorite people, came down to me late in the game and said, 'Let's start the game over again, we're ready to play now,'" Hartman said. "He even went over and asked the timekeeper for an extra 20 minutes."
